HE got upward of a hundred thouſand men out of Galilee, and furniſh'd them all with old arms that he had pick'd up here and there. He fell to bethinking himſelf in the next place of the mighty power of Rome, and what it might be that made the Romans ſo invincible; aſcribing it in the concluſion to their obedience to the word of command and diſcipline. But precept muſt give way to neceſſity, and in regard that he had no time at preſent to train his people up to the latter, he would at leaſt endeavour to inure them to the former. And no better method could he think of, than the Roman way of multiplying officers; dividing and ſubdividing offices of command into ſeveral ſubordinations, one under another; and that was the courſe he took. He had his officers over tens, hundreds and thouſands; and all theſe ſubjected ſtill to other ſuperiors. He taught them the myſtery and diſcipline of all ſignals, the points of war in the voice of the trumpet, to diſtinguiſh an alarum, a charge, a retreat, and one ſounding from another; the manner of fighting, and the forms of battles; the order of bringing off or on, or ſeconding the weak, or relieving the weary'd. He read lectures to them upon the virtues of fortitude, both of body and mind; arming and fortifying them at the ſame time, againſt both dangers and fatigue. In all his leſſons of war, he ſtill made uſe of the Roman diſcipline, as an inſtance of authority and example. He told his ſoldiers farther, that if they would have him hope well of them upon the point of obedience in time of war, they ſhould renounce all manner of unlawful violences, and promiſe him beforehand that they would abſtain from robberies, fraud, pilferings and the like; that they would do juſtice to all people without exception, and not reckon any thing as a gain to themſelves, that accrues from the damage of a neighbour. How is it poſſible, ſays he, for any war againſt conſcience to proſper, when it is ſure to have both God and man for declared enemies! Joſeph went on with his admonitions after this manner; having gotten by this time the complement of an army to his own wiſh. He had ſixty thouſand foot, two hundred and fifty horſe; and beſide theſe, four thouſand five hundred mercenaries, which he much depended upon, and ſix hundred ſelect men likewiſe for the guard of his perſon. Theſe men were no great charge to the country; for all but the mercenaries were maintain'd by the cities; who ſtill as they ſent out one half of them into the war, employ'd the other half to provide neceſſaries for their fellows; ſo that one part of them wrought for the other, and thoſe that were in arms ſerv'd for a protection to their pourveyors.

WHILE Joſeph was in the courſe of his adminiſtration in Galilee, (as you have heard) there ſtarted up an extravagant kind of impoſtor. He came out of Giſchala, the ſon of one Levi, and his name John: a fellow falſe and crafty to the higheſt degree, and ſo poor formerly, that he had not wherewithal to be ſo wicked as he had a mind to be; never without a lie in his mouth, and he was as good at believing falſe ſtories as at ſpreading of them. Fraud paſs'd for a virtue with him, and he would cozen his beſt friends to chuſe. He was a great pretender to good nature, and moſt unmercifully bloody, where there was any thing to be gotten by it. His ambition had no bounds, and the foundation of his hopes was laid in his crimes. He was ſo naturally addicted to thievery, that he taught himſelf the trade: for he began ſingle, and ſo went on, gathering companions by degrees one after another, till he came at laſt to a train of four hundred men; in which number there was neither a coward, nor a man that did not underſtand the uſe of his arms; ſo ſcrupulouſly careful he was of his choice, both for body and mind. The greateſt part of his troop was drawn out of the borders and villages of the Tyrians. With this body of men he laid Galilee waſte, and put a great many of thoſe to the ſword that had withdrawn upon the apprehenſion of a war. He had far greater things yet in his thought, and nothing hinder'd him but want of money, from putting himſelf at the head of a form'd army.

John of Giſchala an extravagant impoſtor. His character

He makes Joſeph his friend, and abuſes his favour.

WHEN he found that Joſeph had a good opinion of him for a man of induſtry and buſineſs, he employ'd his credit with him, in getting him to commit the rebuilding of the walls of Giſchala to his care: upon which account he drew large ſums of money in contributions, from men of ſubſtance and eſtate. And then he had another invention, which was in truth his maſter-piece. He got an order from Joſeph to all the Jews in Syria, forbidding them expreſly to ſend any oil out into the bordering neighbourhood, but of the compoſition of their own nation. Upon this prohibition, John engroſs'd the oil, and ſold it again at eight times the value it coſt him. Now this being a plentiful year, and Galilee a great oil country, the monopoly of getting it to himſelf, and ſending ſo much of it abroad, where there was great ſcarcity of it, brought an incredible ſum of money into his coffers; which treaſure he converted afterwards to the miſchief of his benefactor. And then, computing within himſelf how fair he ſtood for next governor, in caſe Joſeph ſhould come to be remov'd, he gave it in charge to the ruffians under his command, to harras and teize the inhabitants ſtill more and more; which would either exaſperate the people into practices upon his perſon, if he offer'd to controul them; or elſe expoſe him to accuſations and complaints, if he let them alone. For an introduction to his deſign, he had already ſpread a report, that Joſeph was in a plot to betray the province to the Romans; with a great many more malicious and miſchievous falſities that he had muſtered up, toward the inflaming of the rabble againſt Joſeph.

He tampers the rabble againſt Joſeph.

THERE was at that time a parcel of young men of Dabarith, that kept guard in the great plain; and as Ptolemy (king Agrippa's, and queen Berenice's ſteward) was travelling that way, theſe men ſet upon him, took away all his boxes and baggage, to a great value, in rich robes and ſilver plate, and ſix hundred pieces of gold. This was a prize not to be conceal'd, ſo that they carry'd the purchaſe, whole as it was, to Joſeph at Tarichee; who check'd them for the violence they had offer'd to the king's people, and order'd the booty to be depoſited in the charge of one Eneas, an eminent man in the city, ready to be reſtor'd upon demand. This punctilio of honour and juſtice had like to have coſt Joſeph his life: for when the pillagers came to underſtand that they were like to have no ſhare in the prey themſelves; and taking it for granted withal, that Joſeph reſerv'd it entire for the king's uſe, (as in truth he did) they ran raging up and down through all the neighbouring cities and villages, from place to place, with clamous and exclamations, that Joſeph had betray'd them. This outcry raiſed ſuch an uproar, that by day-light next morning, there was a multitude of an hundred thouſand people aſſembled together, at the Circus at Tarichee, raging and raving againſt Joſeph; ſome to have him depos'd or ſton'd, others to have him burnt as a traytor; John, and Jeſus the ſon of Sapphas, who were at that time magiſtrates of Tiberias, all this while encouraging the tumult. Joſeph's friends and guards were in ſuch a fright, upon this monſtrous fury and concourſe of people, that they all abandon'd him but four perſons. He was at that time faſt aſleep, and as they were juſt a ſetting fire to the houſe, his four friends awak'd him. Joſeph was ſtill preſent to himſelf through all this hurry, and not one jot ſurpriz'd, either at the number of his enemies, or at the deſertion of his friends; but frankly preſented himſelf to the view of the people, in rags and aſhes, his hands behind him, and his ſword about his neck. This generous conſtancy moved his friends, and eſpecially thoſe of Tarichee, to the higheſt degree of tenderneſs and compaſſion; but the brutiſh multitude and the borderers, that thought themſelves over-tax'd, ply'd him with curſes and reproaches for his treachery and oppreſſion; and calling upon him over and over to reſtore the money, and confeſs the fact. They gathered, in fine, from from his behaviour, that he was now in a disposition to tell the truth; and by so doing, in a fair way to acquire both pardon and pity. Under these circumstances, he could not do better, he thought, than to divide his enemies, and set them at variance one with another. With this design in his head, he promis'd them a frank confession of the whole matter: so they gave him the hearing, and what he said was to this effect. "It never "could enter into my thought, says he, ei- "ther to deliver up this treasure to Agrippa, "or to make any benefit of it to myself. No, "no, good people; far be it from me to court "the friendship of any prince that is your "enemy, or to propound the reaping of any "advantage to your prejudice. But, says he An artificial insinuation to the Tarichea- ans. "to the Taricheans, considering how naked "your city looks without walls, and how lit- "tle able you yourselves are to rebuild them; "and then considering again, how the people "of Tiberias and several other cities have set "their hearts upon this prize, I thought I "could not do better than to reserve it for the "raising of your walls. If you are of the "same mind, you are bound in honour to ju- "stify me in what I have done: but if other- "wise, I am ready to lay all that I have taken "at your feet, to be dispos'd of at your plea- "sure."

THE Taricheans were highly pleas'd with what he said: the Tiberians as much the contrary; as appear'd by their calumnies, menaces, and reproaches: insomuch, that their rage and animosity was now fiercer than ever. For in the heat of this division, the people let fall their joint-quarrel against Joseph; while the two parties enter'd into as hot a contest the one with the other.

Joseph gains upon the multitude. WHEN Joseph found that he had got the multitude on his side (as there were near forty thousand Taricheans) he took the liberty to tell them plainly how much they were to blame; and that for his part, he was absolutely for employing the ready money they had, toward the fortifying of the town. "Leave it to me, "says he, to take care of the other cities too, "and to see that you want nothing toward the "charge of the work: if you will but follow "my direction, agree one among another, "and take it where it is to be had, without "falling foul upon him that provides it for "you." This look'd so fair, that part of the mutineers, though uneasy enough, withdrew upon it: but at the same time, another party Joseph hard put to it. of two thousand armed men advanced furiously toward Joseph; who presently slipt into the house, and made good the passage, while the rioters stood pressing and menacing on the outside of the door. Joseph was now put to his And brings himself off by a wile. wits once again for another invention, and so he went up stairs to the top of the house, and thence made a sign to the people below for silence: and when the uproar was a little laid, he spake somewhat to them to this purpose: "Good people, says he, what you would "have me do I know not, neither is it possi- "ble for us to understand one another in this "confusion of noises. But this I am sure of, "that I am here ready to do whatever you "shall command me, if you will but send any "body to me, that we may discourse the "business cooly together." Upon this proposal, some of the chief magistrates repair'd to Joseph; where they were presently taken into the house; the doors shut after them, and so carry'd into a remote quarter; where they were torn with rods, till their very ribs and guts were seen. The rabble thought the time long enough, to wait all this while at the door for the issue of the debate; imputing the delay to some difficulties in the case: when all on a sudden, the doors were thrown open, and the commissioners dismiss'd all bloody as they were; which struck the people with such a terror, that those that were highest in their menaces before, were the first now to cast down their arms, and shift for themselves.

This disappointment puts John upon other treacherous practices. THIS disappointment went so to the heart of John, that it exasperated his envy against Joseph still more and more, and put him upon other practices. He counterfeited himself sick, and desired Joseph's leave to make use of the hot waters at Tiberias for his health. Joseph, upon this, gave him recommendatory letters to the governors of the city, that they would be assistant to him in what he wanted; not entertaining the least suspicion of any treachery from him that way. He was no sooner possess'd of the advantages he desir'd, but within two days he was tampering with some, and corrupting others with money and fair words, to abandon Joseph. This practice coming to Silas's ear, who had at that time the charge of the city, he sent advice of it im- Silas gives Joseph notice of this. mediately to Joseph; who, upon the very instant of receiving the letter (though late in the night) hasten'd away for Tiberias, and got thither early the next morning; all the people receiving him with great deference and respect, save only John, who suspected the matter, and the faction which he had debauch'd. But John counterfeits himself sick. John however sent him a complimental excuse by a friend, for not doing himself the honour to wait upon him; being at that time sick in bed, and in no condition to attend him. The people of Tiberias were now drawn together in the great * place by Joseph's order, with an intent to acquaint them with the advice he had receiv'd. John got notice of it, and sent Joseph set upon, and scapes narrowly. a band of bravo's arm'd to destroy him; but in the instant of their drawing their swords (being planted ready for the execution) the people gave a shrieck: and Joseph taking the alarum, when their weapons were just at his throat, leapt down from a standing of six † cubits high, that he had mounted for his harangue, and so made his escape to a little boat upon the lake, and only two of his guards along with him.

Joseph's moderation. THE soldiers presently betook themselves to their arms, to avenge their general upon these traitors. But Joseph was so afraid of a civil war and the consequences of it, in the exposure of the city upon a private quarrel, that he sent a messenger to his people, with a positive command not to do any manner of mischief to the traitors, but what was of absolute necessity to their own preservation: wherein they follow'd their orders to a tittle.

* He means a place which consisted of a large plot of ground, which was appointed for public exercises, such as running, wrestling, horse-races, &c.

† Six Jewish cubits amounted to something upwards of three English yards and an half.

So

This treason turns all people's hearts against John.

So soon as the rumour of this treachery came to be nois'd in the country, with the manner of its contrivance, and the author of it, the neighbourhood gather'd together, and put themselves upon the march to find out John; but he was got into Gischala, his own country, before they could come up to him. There was not a city in Galilee that did not go over to Joseph upon this occasion, and many thousands of armed men along with them, who did all offer their services against John, whom they upbraided with the title of traytor, and common enemy of mankind; undertaking to deliver up that treacherous wretch to the flames, with the city that protected him. Joseph's answer was, "That he was highly sensible of "their kindness and good-will; but was however for moderate counsels, where the case "would bear it; and that he had rather save "an enemy by temperance and prudence, than "destroy him by force. But, says Joseph, "I should be well enough content to see e-"very man by name, out of the several cities, "excepted from pardon, that ever join'd with "John in the rebellion; his goods to be con-"fiscated, his house burnt, and his family "destroy'd: unless he should in five days af-"ter the publication of such a decree, quit "the party and interest of John, and return to "his allegiance." The heads of the several cities were unanimously forward in the promoting of these conditions; a proclamation formally publish'd, and all things in pursuance of it duly executed. This declaration brought over three thousand of the rebels from John; who cast themselves and their arms at the feet of Joseph. But John, with the remainder, which were about a thousand Syrian fugitives, betook himself to secret plots and practices, when he found he could carry his point no further above board. He had his informers privately at work up and down in Jerusalem, to calumniate Joseph for extravagant levies, upon a design to make himself master of the place, if he were not restrained by a stronger power. They that knew any thing of the matter gave no heed at all to the story: but there was yet an invidious and spiteful party, even of the magistrates themselves, and other principal members of the town, that supply'd John with money towards the maintaining of a war with Joseph: nay, they went so far as to draw up an act in readiness, for the removal of him from his command. And they did not think that enough neither, but sent a detachment of five and twenty hundred arm'd men, and four other persons famous both for law and eloquence: whose business was to try if they could supplant Joseph in the credit he had with the people; and with order if they could get him to come away by fair means, to offer him no violence; but in case of his refusal, to treat him as an enemy. These commissioners were Joazar, a lawyer's son; Ananias the son of Saddouc; Simon and Judas, the sons of Jonathas.

Secret plots and practices carry'd on against Joseph.

JOSEPH's friends gave him a general intelligence of a party of soldiers sent toward him: but the enemy's counsels were kept so close, that they could not inform him with what design; so that there was no place for a particular precaution. Four cities went immediately over to the enemy: that is to say, Sepphoris, Gamala, Gischala and Tiberias; but he was quickly master of them again without blood. Four of the chief men that he had taken, both for arms and counsel, he sent back to Jerusalem; which transported the people to so violent a rage against them, that if they had not made their escapes in time, they would have been all certainly cut to pieces, as well they themselves that were sent, as those that sent them.

Tiberias revolts, and is recover'd by a notable stratagem. Joseph, with only seven unarm'd men, does the work. The Tiberians render themselves and submit. Tiberias sends hostages for the performance of articles. The blame of all is laid upon Clitus, and they call for justice upon him. Clitus is sentenc'd to do justice upon himself, and to cut off one hand with the other.

JOHN was all this while in such a dread of Joseph, that he durst not so much as shew his head out of the walls of Gischala. Some few days after this, Tiberias revolted; and inviting Agrippa to take possession of the town, acknowledg'd him for their king. The day being appointed, Agrippa fail'd of his time; and only some Roman horsemen appearing, they fell off from Joseph. When the news of this desertion came to Tarichee, Joseph, that had sent his troops out a foraging, was at a nonplus what to do. For he durst not venture himself alone among the whole body of the deserters, and he durst not stay in the town neither, for fear of being surpriz'd by the king's soldiers; besides that the next day being their sabbath, there was nothing more to be done.

Tiberias revolts.

JOSEPH had no way now to manage the revolters, but by putting a trick upon them; and he happen'd upon a stratagem that succeeded to his wish. He caused the gates of Tarichee to be all shut and guarded, to prevent giving any intelligence to Tiberias of what he was doing. Upon this, he order'd all the boats in the lake to be gotten together, to the number of two hundred and thirty in the whole, and four men to every boat. With these vessels he set sail early in the morning for Tiberias; and when he was advanc'd within such a distance of the town, that they might easily discern the body of the fleet, without distinguishing what men they had a-board, he order'd all his empty vessels to come to an anchor and stay behind; while he himself, with only seven of his guards, and those unarm'd too, row'd up towards the town within sight of the place. The people were at this instant railing and reviling him from the walls, after their usual manner; but upon sight of him under those circumstances, and taking for granted, that all the ships they saw were full of soldiers, they presently cast down their arms in a fright; and with all the actions and expressions of submission imaginable, begg'd of him to be merciful to a miserable city and people. Joseph gave them all the hearing, but with many a bitter menace and reproach at the end of it. "What! says he, are you engag'd in a Tiberias ſends hoſtages for the performance of articles.

UPON this they immediately diſpatch'd away to him ten of the principal men of the town, as their deputies to treat with him; whom Joſeph preſently order'd to be put aboard a fiſhing-veſſel there at hand, and carry'd a little out of the way. He ſent afterward for fifty of the chief ſenators, as a further ſecurity, for performance of conditions, and ſo inventing one excuſe after another, he ſtill demanded more and more, till he had got the whole ſenate into his hands, to the number of ſix hundred perſons, beſides two thouſand of the inhabitants; whom as faſt as the boats fill'd, he ordered to be convey'd to Tarichee, and there kept in cuſtody.

The people lay all the blame upon Clitus, and preſs for juſtice upon him.

UPON this, the multitude ſet up an outcry againſt Clitus; loudly exclaiming againſt him, as the ſole author and ring-leader of the revolt; deſiring Joſeph, in fine, to make him exemplary, and to accept of his puniſhment for ſatisfaction. Joſeph was not for putting any man to death; but however, upon the people's ſupplication, he order'd Levi, one of the guards, to go and cut off both Clitus's hands. The ſoldier durſt not venture upon the execution, among ſuch a multitude of hit enemies: which Joſeph took ſuch offence at, that he was juſt about to go aſhore, and do it himſelf. Clitus perceiving this, made his ſuit to Joſeph to content himſelf with one of his hands. Joſeph granted the requeſt, upon condition, that he himſelf ſhould cut it off; whereupon, Clitus drew out his ſword with his right hand, and cut off his left: ſuch was the awe Joſeph had over him. Thus was Tiberias recover'd, with only Joſeph himſelf, and ſeven ſoldiers, and a parcel of empty boats.

Clitus does juſtice upon himſelf; and cuts off the one hand with the other, according to the ſentence.

NOT many days after this, upon the revolt of Sepphoris, and ſome other cities, Joſeph gave his ſoldiers the pillage of Giſchala and Sepphoris: but upon the application of the inhabitants, he cauſed reſtitution to be made of all they could diſcover, and the like at Tiberias: Joſeph propoſing both to chaſtiſe them for their inſolence, and at the ſame time regain their affections by returning their goods.

Galilee at peace, and Jeruſalem preparing for a war. The horrible ravages and cruelties of Simon the ſon of Gioras.

Galilee at peace and Jeruſalem preparing for a war.

GALILEE was now quiet; and the Jews were no ſooner at peace one with another, but they were preparing to embroil themſelves in war with the Romans. Ananus the high-prieſt, and the great men in Jeruſalem who ſtood in oppoſition to the Romans, haſten'd all that was poſſible the rebuilding of their walls; the providing of military inſtruments and machines; weapons of all ſorts, as darts, arrows, and the like: and all hands at work upon warlike preparations; training up the youth alſo to the exerciſe of their arms. All things were in ſtrange confuſion at that time; men of ſobriety and foreſight, with heavineſs of heart, could not forbear weeping at the proſpect of imminent calamities. The countenance of things was afflicting to any man that wiſh'd for peace; and for publick incendiaries, the worſe the better. The city, in ſhort, had death and deſolation in the very face of it before ever the Romans came thither. Ananus was altogether againſt the formality of theſe preparatories for a war; in hope to reclaim the madneſs of the mutineers, call'd in thoſe days by the name of zelots, and to bring them to reaſon: but he miſcarry'd in the attempt, as will be ſeen hereafter. Simon the ſon of Gioras was at this time at the head of a band of freebooters, that liv'd upon the ſpoil in the toparchy of Acrabatane: where they not only plunder'd and pillag'd great mens houſes; but fell foul upon their bodies too, and treated the maſters themſelves with blows and baſtinadoes. At this rate publickly exerciſing a bare-fac'd tyranny. He went on making this havock, till he was forced by the troops of Ananus and the magiſtrates, to ſhift for himſelf, with the ſmall party he had among the thieves of Maſſada; and there he continu'd till Ananus and ſome of his other enemies were cut off. He committed ſuch outrages at Idumea, and the adjacent places, that, for the ſecurity of the country, the government was oblig'd to gariſon the very villages. This was the ſtate of affairs in Judea at that juncture.

Nero's vanity and oſtentation. The diſtracted ſtate of the Roman affairs. Nero gives Veſpaſian the government of Syria. Veſpaſian's fitneſs for ſuch a truſt. Veſpaſian and Titus advance a mighty army. The defeat of Ceſtius makes the Jews raſh and bold. They advance towards Aſcalon. The bodies engage, and the Jews totally routed. Ten thouſand kill'd upon the place. The Jews not a match for the Romans. Eight thouſand Jews more ſlain upon a ſecond overthrow. Niger the general preſerv'd by a wonderful providence. Veſpaſian haſtens away to Ptolemais: and the Sepphorites are very friendly to the Romans.

Nero, with a faint heart, ſets up for a man of courage.
His vanity and oſtentation.

THE news of Ceſtius's diſaſter in Judea ſtruck Nero with fear and confuſion; but he look'd big upon it however and cover'd the faintneſs of his heart with an affectation of dignity and diſdain. "This, ſays he, was the fault of my own "officer, not the bravery of the enemy." And ſo he carry'd it on with an air of haughtineſs and contempt, as if it were not for the honour of the empire, or of his ſovereign ſtation above all other princes, to be ſo much as touch'd with the common accidents of human life, or the iniquities of fortune. But after all this oſtentation of an invincible courage, the cares he had in his head betray'd the weakneſs of his mind, by the uneaſineſs he was in for want of a general equal to the mighty neceſſities of the empire. For the caſt was at this time wavering and falling off; the Jews deep in a rebellion already; other nations ſtaggering, and the empire all over ſick of the ſame diſeaſe. Now how to keep the one quiet; reduce the other, and to prevent the ill humour in the third, from tainting the whole body? This was the queſtion, and the great work that was now neceſſary to be attended. Veſpaſian, in fine, was the inſtrument pitch'd upon, as the only perſon that Nero could think competent for the diſcharge of ſuch a truſt. He was now pretty well advanced in years, and had ſpent the whole courſe of his life in arms, from firſt to laſt. He was the man that ſettled the peace of the empire in the weſt, upon the revolt of the Germans. It was he that finiſh'd the conqueſt of Britain; which before that, was neither perfectly ſubdu'd, nor known: and he preſented his father Claudius alſo with the honour of a triumph for it, though he had taken no pains, nor been preſent in the action. Now conſidering Veſpaſian under all theſe circumſtances; his years, reſolution, faith and conduct; ſo many children as he had, ſo many hoſtages for his fidelity; and in a vigour of youth to execute their father's orders: beſide the concurrence of God's ſecret providence, with other incidents for the good of the empire. All this together mov'd Nero to make Veſpaſian general of his forces in Syria. And for his further encouragement, his commiſſion was accompany'd with a great many fair words, after the practice of the world, when they have need of a man. Veſpaſian had no ſooner receiv'd his commiſſion from Nero, in Achaia, but he preſently diſpatch'd away his ſon Titus for Alexandria, to draw off the fifth and and the tenth legions there; while he himself croſs'd the Helleſpont, and ſo took his way by land into Syria: where he came to a rendezvous with all the Roman troops, and the auxiliaries that were ſent in by the princes bordering upon that province.

The defeat of Ceſtius makes the Jews raſh and inſolent.

THE Jews in the mean time, were ſo tranſported with the unexpected advantage they had got over the Romans under Ceſtius, that they behav'd themſelves like ſo many madmen; puſhing on the war beyond all bounds of moderation and prudence. They drew up what ſtrength they were able to make out of the beſt troops they had, and with that body marched towards Aſcalon; an ancient city, about five hundred * and twenty furlongs from Jeruſalem. The Jews had ever an averſion to theſe people; and for that reaſon, they made choice of that place for their firſt attack. They had for their leaders three famous captains: Niger, of Peraita; Silas, a Babylonian; and John, an Eſſene; men eminent for ſtrength of body, reſolution, and good government.

They advance towards Aſcalon.

ASCALON had a wall of a prodigious ſtrength, if there had but been men enow to defend it: the whole gariſon conſiſting only of one company of foot and a troop of horſe, under the command of Anthony. The Jews thought it long till they could come to blows with the Romans; and ſo made a too haſty march of it to fall upon them by ſurprize: but Anthony having intelligence of their approach, without being ſhock'd either at their courage or their numbers, had drawn his horſe out of the town beforehand, to be in readineſs for the encounter. Upon their advance, he received their charge with great bravery; and ſo put a ſtop to their progreſs toward the walls of the town.

The bodies engage, and the Jews totally routed.

Now the Romans, by the advantage of veterans againſt raw ſoldiers; horſe to foot, order to confuſion; troops well appointed, to people but lightly arm'd; counſel and conduct, againſt rage and paſſion; and men, in fine, under diſcipline and command, againſt a looſe head-ſtrong multitude: the Romans, I ſay, by theſe advantages, made no difficulty of putting the Jews to the rout; for their firſt ranks were no ſooner broken by the Roman horſe, but they fled ſeveral ways; ſome toward the town, where they were cruſh'd to death by crouds of their own people; and needed no worſe enemy; others ſcatter'd all over the plain, with the Roman cavalry at their back, and field-room enough for the horſe to roam in. Upon this confuſion they were all at mercy; ſome one way, ſome another; for which way ſoever they fled, the Romans were upon them; overtaking ſome, croſſing upon others: and ſome again they ſurrounded, and diſpatch'd with their darts. In this calamitous ſtate of deſperation, their vaſt multitudes were no more than ſo many ſingle men; and the Romans, at the ſame time, flush'd with victory, out of their ſmall number, had enow and to ſpare. The Jews, on the other hand, as they were aſhamed of having turn'd their backs, ſo they did all that was poſſible toward the recovery of their honour; but the Romans, in the courſe of their ſucceſs, without either wearineſs or intermiſſion, purſu'd their victory the greateſt part of the day, kill'd ten thouſand of them upon the ſpot; two of their generals, John and Silas, being of the number; the reſt, moſt of them being wounded, made their eſcape with Niger (the only ſurvivor of the three generals) to Salis, a town in Idumea. On the Roman ſide there were only ſome few wounded.

Ten thouſand Jews kill'd upon the place.

THIS was a terrible loſs; but ſo far were the Jews yet from ſinking under the burden, that on the contrary, betwixt a deſponding ſorrow, and the thirſt of revenge, their ſpirits were rais'd upon it; inſomuch, that inſtead of a diſcouragement drawn from the laſt defeat, they gather'd matter of hope and comfort from the remembrance of former ſucceſſes. This confidence drew after it a ſecond overthrow. When they had paus'd a ſhort time, ſcarce long enough to cure their wounds, the Jews in a moſt outragious indignation, got together all the power they were able to make, and in a much greater body attempted Aſcalon once again, under the ſame diſadvantages of want of ſkill and diſcipline, and with the ſame fortune as before; for they fell at unawares into an ambuſh of Anthony's by the way they were to paſs; where they were beſet, charg'd, and routed by Anthony's troops before they could put themſelves in order of battle: they loſt eight thouſand upon the place; the reſt eſcaping with their general Niger, who acquitted himſelf ſeveral times upon that occaſion like a great captain, and a man of honour. But the enemy cloſely purſuing them, they were driven for ſanctuary into a ſtrong caſtle belonging to a village call'd Bezedel. This caſtle was look'd upon to be impregnable; ſo that Anthony, to make ſhort work of it, ſet fire to the fort, as the only way to deſtroy the caſtle and the general both at once. Upon this exploit, the Romans went their way triumphing and rejoicing, making no doubt but Niger was deſtroy'd in the flames. But he, it ſeems, to avoid the fire, leap'd down from the top of the caſtle into a deep vault; and as ſome of his friends were ſearching for his body three days after, to give it funeral rites, he preſented himſelf before them yet living; which tranſported the Jews, out of an affliction almoſt inconſolable, into the moſt ſurprizing exceſs of joy imaginable, to find ſo neceſſary an inſtrument of their well-being deliver'd by ſo ſignal a providence.

Eight thouſand Jews more ſlain upon a ſecond overthrow.

Niger preſerv'd by a wonderful providence.

VESPASIAN being now come with his army to Antioch (the capital of Syria) and without all diſpute, for beauty and ſituation, the third city in the Roman empire; he found in this city king Agrippa, with all his own troops, expecting him. He paſs'd from thence to Ptolemais, and there were the inhabitants of Sepphoris, a town of Galilee, waiting to receive him. Theſe were a well affected people, but ſo well underſtanding their own intereſt too, and the formidable power of Rome, that, without ſtaying for the coming of Veſpaſian, to ſhew their good affections to the government, they had by anticipation promis'd and proteſted as much to Ceſtius Gallus; receiving a gariſon from him, and acknowledging him for their governor, and binding themſelves to ſerve him chearfully, even againſt their own countrymen.

* Five hundred and twenty furlongs amounted to ſixty five Engliſh miles and an half, and an hundred and eighty geometrical paces.

Veſpaſian did likewiſe grant them, at their requeſt, ſuch a body of horſe and foot for a gariſon as might be a ſufficient ſecurity againſt incurſions, if the Jews ſhould make any ſuch attempt. Now Sepphoris being both the largeſt and the ſtrongeſt city of all Galilee, Veſpaſian judg'd it a matter of high importance to have it in good hands.

CHAP. II.

The two Galilees, with a deſcription of them. A deſcription of Samaria. Jeruſalem ſtands in the middle of Judea. A diviſion or diſtribution of Judea.

The two Galilees, with the ſituation and deſcription of them.

THERE are two Galilees, known by the names of the Upper and the Lower Galilee, which are encompaſs'd by Phenicia and Syria. They are bounded on the weſt by the city and territory of Ptolemais, and by mount Carmel; formerly belonging to the Galileans, at preſent to the Tyrians; and next adjoining to * Gaba, or the city of the horſemen, ſo call'd, from the plantation of Herod's horſemen that were there ſettled, upon their diſmiſſion. On the ſouth, with Samaria and Scythopolis, as far as the river Jordan. On the eaſt, with Hippene, Gadaris and Gaulanitis, together with the borders of the kingdom of Agrippa; and on the north, with Tyre, and the frontiers of the Tyrians.

The Lower Galilee.

THE Lower Galilee ſtretcheth length-ways from Tiberias to Zabulon, near Ptolemais on the ſea-coaſt. It reaches in breadth from Xaloth on the great plain as far as Berſabe; and there begins the breadth of the Upper Galilee, and ſo goes up to the village of Baca, which divides it from the territory of the Syrians. And as to the length of it, they reckon it from Thella, a village near Jordan, to Meroth.

THESE two provinces are of a large extent, and ſurrounded with neighbouring princes of ſeveral diſtinct nations; whom upon all occaſions of controverſy, they have ſtill made head againſt: for, over and above their being very populous, the inhabitants are bold and warlike, and train'd up from children to exerciſes of arms; the men neither wanted courage, nor the country good ſtore of proviſions. Their lands are fruitful to admiration, and ſuch nurſeries of all manner of fruit trees and plants, that it would make any man in love with husbandry. The grounds are all over well ſtock'd with people and cultivated, and not one foot that lies idle. There are cities and villages in abundance; which muſt needs be populous in ſo plentiful a country; for the number of inhabitants is computed to be above fifteen thouſand in the leaſt of them. So that though Galilee falls ſhort of the country beyond Jordan, in the compaſs of ground, it is yet much ſuperior to it in ſtrength and value: for over and above the fertility of the ſoil, every ſpot of it is ſo improv'd, that there's no ground loſt: whereas in that vaſt tract of land beyond Jordan, the greater part of it is dry and barren, and not ſo proper for corn, and ſeveral other neceſſaries for the life and ſervice of man. Not but that in ſome particular places, as Perea for one, the ſoil is richer, and as well ſtored with excellent fruits as any other place; witneſs the vines, olive-trees, palm-trees, and other plants that we find up and down in the fields, in great abundance and perfection; and they are all water'd and refreſh'd with torrents from the mountains, and with quick ſprings in the exceſſive heats. The length of this country lies from Macherus to Pella; the breadth from Philadelphia to Jordan; with Pella on the north, the river Jordan on the weſt; the land of the Moabites on the ſouth; and Arabia † Silbonitis, Philadelphene, and ‡ Geraſa on the eaſt.

A deſcription of Samaria.

Samaria is ſituate betwixt Judea and Galilee; beginning at a village call'd Ginea, upon the plain, and extending to the toparchy of Acrabatane. The country is much of the nature with that of Judea; full of mountains and plains; of an excellent ſoil, and which plentifully rewards the labour of tillage and manure; it abounding with great ſtore of fruits, both wild and meliorated or domeſtick; and though it is naturally dry, yet it is abundantly ſupply'd with ſhowers: beſide the beſt water in the world; incomparable paſtures, and milk no where ſo plentiful. But the ſuperlative excellency and advantage of theſe two provinces is yet behind: that is to ſay, the incredible number of inhabitants. And to conclude, the boundary to them both is Anuath, otherwiſe call'd the village of Borceus.

Jeruſalem ſtands in the middle of Judea.

THE ſame village bounds Judea likewiſe on the north. And the length of it runs from the ſouth ſide to a village upon the borders of Arabia, call'd Jardan: the breadth from the river Jordan to Joppa. In the middle of it ſtands Jeruſalem; which has been call'd, aptly enough by ſome the navel, or the centre of the province. Judea, in fine, wants nothing either by ſea or land to make it as delicious as it is fruitful, having the advantage of ſea ports all the way to Ptolomais.

A diviſion or diſtribution of Judea.

It is divided into eleven parts; Jeruſalem the firſt, as the ſovereign head of all the reſt: the other ten are diſtributed into as many toparchies; Gophna, the ſecond, and ſo Acrabatane, Tamna, Lydda, Ammaus, Pella, Idumea, Engadi, Herodion and Jericho. The neighbouring countries are under the juriſdiction of Jamnia and Joppe; as Gamalitis, Gaulanitis, Batanea and Trachonitis, are comprized in the kingdom of Agrippa, but excepted out of the parts firſt before ſpoken of. This country is inhabited by the Syrians and the Jews promiſcuouſly, extends itſelf in breadth from mount Libanus and the ſources of Jordan, to the lake of Tiberias; and in length, from the village of Arphas to Julias.

Veſpaſian ſends Placidus with relief to the Sepphorites. Galilee at the mercy of fire and ſword. Titus comes up to Veſpaſian at Ptolemais with a vaſt army. The order and policy of the Roman diſcipline. The Roman way of incamping. The trumpet gives every man his orders. The manner of giving the word for a battle. The Roman way of marching. The extent of the Roman empire.

WE have been as brief upon Judea, with the boundaries and confines of it, as the matter would bear.

Veſpaſian ſends relief to the Sepphorites, under the command of Placidus.

THE ſupplies that Veſpaſian ſent to the Sepphorites, being a thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foot, under the command of Placidus the tribune, were diſtributed after the drawing of them up in the great plain, into two diviſions. The horſe continu'd in the camp, and the foot were quarter'd within the walls, for the ſecurity of the city; but not without making daily excurſions up and down into the neighbourhood; which gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to Joſeph and his companions, though they continued quiet, without attempting any act of hoſtility, either by aſſault or ſurprize: beſide that they pillag'd both city and country of whatever they could come at, and fell ſo ſeverely upon the inhabitants at every ſally they made, that they durſt not ſo much as ſhew their heads any more out of their gates.

JOSEPH, for all this, ventur'd to make a bold attempt upon the city, in hopes of carrying his point; but finding to his coſt that he himſelf, before his going off from the Galileans, had made the place in a manner impregnable againſt himſelf to the Roman power, and that it was not to be gain'd from the Sepphorites either by force or policy, he let fall his enterprize. This practice however (out of a natural averſion the Romans have to treachery) made the war ten times fiercer, and the enemy much more outragious than before: depopulating the country night and day with fire and ſword, pillaging whatever they could lay their hands on, putting all to death without mercy, where they found reſiſtance, and making ſlaves of the reſt. Galilee, in fine, was all cover'd with fire and blood; and not a ſoul but had their part in this calamity, and nothing left them to truſt to, but the towns that Joſeph himſelf had fortify'd.

Galilee at the mercy of fire and ſword.

TITUS was by this time come up to Veſpaſian at Ptolemais, with the troops he brought from Alexandria: and his arrival was much ſooner than upon a winter's march could have been expected. And there he join'd the fifteenth legions which he had brought with him to the fifth and the tenth which were with his father, and were reputed the braveſt troops of the empire. They were follow'd alſo with eighteen companies, and five more to them out of Ceſarea; with one troop of horſe, and five troops of Syrian horſe. Ten of theſe cohorts had a thouſand men each, and the reſt ſix hundred and thirteen foot, and ſixſcore horſe, beſide a very conſiderable enforcement of auxiliaries from the neighbouring princes, as Antiochus, Agrippa and Sohemus, who ſent their two thouſand foot apiece, and a thouſand horſe; and Malchus, the king of Arabia, five thouſand horſe. Theſe troops all together made up a body of ſixty thouſand horſe and foot, beſide the train of baggage, and ſervants that followed the camp; who, for experience, courage, military skill and application (for the moſt part) were not much inferior to their maſters themſelves.

Titus comes up to Veſpaſian at Ptolemais with a vaſt army.

THE policy and wiſdom of the Romans, in this way of ordering their ſervants, can never be ſufficiently admir'd: for it makes them at the ſame time not only ſerviceable to private families, but to the common-wealth alſo in offices of war and government. And then whoever conſiders the excellency of the Roman diſcipline and conduct, in the matter of military order and execution, will find that fortune had the leaſt ſhare in the ſucceſs of their arms; and that they advanced themſelves to the command of the world upon the foundations of their own honour and virtue. They were not then to learn the art of war, when they came to fall under the neceſſity of uſing it: but they made it their exerciſe and practice in times of peace, and handled their arms as naturally as if they had been born with them: ſo that peace or war was, in that reſpect, all a caſe to them; and they were ever in readineſs, without troubling their heads about times or ſeaſons. Their very trials of skill look'd like real combats; and not a day paſs'd, but every man went through all his exerciſes, which render'd military duty familiar to them. By this means they were always in order, without feeling the inconveniencies either of fear or fatigue. Now for men that keep themſelves upon the guard of this habit and diſcipline, an enemy under leſs regular conduct is not able to deal with them. But, as I was a ſaying, their exerciſes are effectually but combats, without drawing blood; as their fierceſt encounters are but bloody exerciſes. To ſecure themſelves from ſurprize, upon entring into an enemy's country, the firſt thing they do is to pitch and fortify their camp, not ſlightly or diſorderly, but with a regard to the condition of the place: levelling the ground where it is uneven, and for the figure of it, in the form of a quadrangle. In order to the diſpatch and the execution of all this, they have their ſmiths, carpenters, pioneers, and other workmen for fortifications, to attend the army. The inner part of the camp is diſtributed into quarters, or lodgments, for the officers and ſoldiers; and the outſide carries the reſemblance of a wall, where they raiſe turrets at an equal diſtance one from another: and in the intervals, they have all ſorts of weapons to be us'd at a diſtance, as darts, arrows, ſtones, &c. and inſtruments or machines alſo for the caſting of them. This camp hath four large gates for horſe and man to paſs and repaſs at pleaſure, as there ſhall be occaſion. On the inſide of it there are ſeveral ſtreets orderly diſpos'd, with lodgments in the middle, for the head officers: and within them again, a tent erected for the general, after the form of a little temple; a market-place, with ſhops and ſtandings for artificers and tradeſmen; courts of juſtice and tribunals, for the hearing of cauſes as well military as civil: and, taking it all together, it looks like a city of a matter of one night's growth; ſo wonderful is the diſpatch, where there are great maſters to direct, and many hands to execute.

The order and policy of the Roman diſcipline.

The Roman way of incamping.

execute. And if this, in fine, be not enough for the ſecuring of the quarter, 'tis but running a line of circumvallation about it at laſt, with a trench of about four * cubits deep, and as many over to finiſh the work. The ſoldiers have their arms ſtill about them, and live in a military kind of brotherhood, orderly and peaceably one with another. Upon any occaſion of fetching wood, water, forage, &c. they go out in parties: and ſo for their times of repaſt, they do not eat now and then ſeparately, when, and as every man pleaſes, but all together; and the trumpet directs them when to ſleep, when to riſe, when to ſet the watch, &c. So it is, in fine, that they do nothing but by rule and command. In the morning the ſoldiers wait upon their captains, the captains upon the tribunes, and then both captains and tribunes upon the general; from whom they receive the word or ſignal, and ſuch other orders to be communicated to their ſubordinates as the occaſion requires: to the end that every man may be inſtructed in his duty, and how to behave himſelf upon action; how and when to ſally out, or to retreat, and to do all things in order whatever they do.

The trumpet gives every man his orders.

The trumpet tells them when they are to decamp; and then they take up their tents, pack up their baggage, and prepare to be gone. Upon the ſecond ſounding, they load their carriages and their ſumpters, and ſtand ready to move; watching for the word of command, as people do for the ſign at a horſe race when to ſtart; and at the ſame time ſetting fire to the camp, which may be eaſily repair'd by throwing up another; beſide that the enemy ſhall make no benefit of it. Upon the third ſounding, the army marches, and all poſſible care is taken to prevent ſtragglers, and to move every man in his rank.

The Roman way of decamping.

The word given for a battle.

On the right-hand of the general ſtands the herald, who with a loud voice puts this queſtion thrice over to the army: Are you ready for a battle? The ſoldiers in a martial tone and action, return him this anſwer as often over: We are ready for a battle. Nay, many times they prevent the very demand, by ſtretching forth their right-hands, and other ſigns of joy and ſatisfaction, in hope of coming to that iſſue. After this, the army advances with as much manly gravity and compoſure as if it were in the face of an enemy.

The Roman way of marching.

The foot are arm'd with helmets and breaſt-plates; two ſwords, one on each ſide, and that on the left much longer than the other; which is about the ſize of a dagger. The general's guards carry javelins and targets, and all the reſt pikes and long bucklers, a ſaw, a basket, a pick-ax, a hatchet, a rein, a ſcythe, a chain, and bread for three days: ſo that the men carry'd little leſs burden than the beaſts. The horſemen wear long ſwords girt to their right-ſides. They carry a launce in their hand, a buckler in a ſcarf hanging a-croſs the horſe-ſide, a quiver with three darts or more in it, broad-pointed, and about the length of a ſhort javelin; their helmets and corſlets like thoſe of the foot. And for the cavaliers that attend the perſon of the general, their arms are the very ſame with the reſt, only being choſen by lot, the troop that has the luck to be ſo pitch'd upon has a right of precedence.

This is the Roman way of marching and encamping, with the various manner of their arming. They do nothing in their military enterprizes and combats that is raſh and inconſiderate; but their actions are the reſult of deliberate counſels: by which means, either their failings will be fewer, or thoſe that happen will be more eaſily redreſs'd; for, provided that matters be well-weigh'd and digeſted, they had rather ſuffer a diſappointment by the ill ſucceſs of a well grounded enterprize, than become indebted to fortune for an advantage contrary to reaſon. For theſe blind events give people an ill habit of abandoning all to chance, without any precaution or foreſight; whereas men are the wiſer and the better for inſtructive examples, though in caſes of miſcarriage; beſide the comfort of falling with honour and a good conſcience, by a calamity which human prudence could not prevent.

This continual uſe and exerciſe of arms does not only harden and ſtrengthen the bodies of men, but elevates their very minds alſo into reſolutions more couragious and firm: beſide that people are kept in awe under the apprehenſion of penalties and rigour. It is death by the martial law, for a ſoldier, not only to deſert his ſtation or betray his truſt, but for the very leaſt neglect of his duty. Now this is a terrible rigour, and yet the officers are ſtill more inexorable than the laws themſelves; for they make amends, they think, in the honours and rewards that they confer upon men of merit for the cruelty of puniſhing criminals. And ſuch is the reverence they have for the authority of military order and diſcipline, that a Roman army is certainly the moſt glorious ſpectacle under the ſun, in a time of peace; and in a ſtate of war, the moſt dreadful: for every individual of the whole army moves but as a member of the ſame body, and at the ſame time in ſuch a harmony of motion, as if they were all govern'd by the ſame mind. Their ears are always open to attend the word of command, their eyes watching to receive the ſignal, and their hands ever in readineſs to execute the orders of their ſuperiors, in contempt of all difficulties and dangers. When they come to the encounter, and that the battle is once reſolved upon, they never trouble their heads with the enemies numbers, or conduct; the difficulties or dangers of paſſes; nay, nor with the malice of fortune itſelf; but break through all obſtacles, and make themſelves as good as ſure of the victory before they ſtrike a ſtroke. Now if their counſels and deliberations be govern'd altogether by political prudence, and ſound advice, and follow'd with an anſwerable vigour of execution; what wonder is it to ſee the Roman empire miſtreſs of the univerſe, and ſtretching itſelf as far as the Euphrates on the eaſt, the ocean on the weſt, the fruitful country of Africa on the ſouth, and the Rhine and Danube on the north? And yet, when all is ſaid, the dominion ſeems ſtill too narrow for the great ſouls of the poſſeſſors of it.

The extent of the Roman empire.

* Four cubits were equivalent to two Engliſh yards, one foot three inches and an half.

IT is not my purpoſe in what I have here deliver'd, to write a panegyrick to the honour of the Romans; but rather for the comfort of thoſe that are overcome, to ſhew they have no reaſon to be aſhamed of their maſters, and to divert raſh innovators and malecontents from attempting impoſſibilities. Beſide that this diſcourſe may perhaps be of ſome ſervice to the curious, in the light it will give them toward a better underſtanding of the Roman methods of government and diſcipline: but I ſhall return from whence I digreſs'd.

Placidus breaks into Galilee.

WHILE Veſpaſian was with his ſon Titus at Ptolemais, he gave all neceſſary orders for the ſupply and government of the army; and in this interim, Placidus made an inroad into Galilee, over-ran the whole country, took prodigious numbers of priſoners, and put the greater part of them to the ſword. Now theſe were only a timorous faint-hearted ſort of people; but the more reſolute part of the Galileans were obſerv'd to take ſanctuary ſtill in cities, and other ſtrong holds that Joſeph had fortify'd; which when Placidus took notice of, he reſolv'd to ſet upon them by aſſault, and to begin with Jotapata; which was the moſt defenſible place they had, making no doubt at all of carrying it upon the firſt attack by ſurprize, and thereby opening a way to the taking of other places; which would acquire him a reputation among the other generals: for the very example of Jotapata, being the ſtrongeſt and moſt defenſible place in all Galilee, would probably draw the remainder after it. But Placidus was much miſtaken in his conjecture; for the inhabitants being precaution'd of his deſign, and that he was already upon his march, went out of the city to encounter him; and falling upon the Romans at unawares, with a conſiderable body, and in good heart, (their country, wives and children, being all at ſtake) they put them to the rout, wounded a great many of his men, but kill'd only ſeven of them, being well-arm'd, and making an orderly retreat. Of the Jews there were only three ſlain, and ſome few wounded; for being ill-arm'd, they were fain to content themſelves to fight with darts and lances at a diſtance, without venturing on a cloſe engagement. Upon this repulſe, Placidus left the place.

He aſſaults Jotapata.

Placidus is beaten off.

Veſpaſian marches from Ptolemais into Galilee. The order of his march. Upon Veſpaſian's advance, Joſeph's people deſert. Joſeph gives over the war, and withdraws to Tiberias.

Veſpaſian marches from Ptolemais into Galilee.

VESPASIAN, being now reſolv'd upon an incurſion into Galilee, leaves Ptolemais, and gives the army their marching orders, according to the inſtitution of the Roman diſcipline; the auxiliaries being light-arm'd, and the archers advancing before the reſt, to keep the enemy at a diſtance; and, by ſcouting out into the woods, and other ſuſpected paſſages, for diſcovery of their ambuſhes, to prevent ſurprizes. Theſe were follow'd with a party of Roman horſe and foot; and after them, a detachment of ten men out of every company, with their arms and neceſſary proviſions for the forming of a camp. The next in courſe were the pioneers, to level and mend the ways, and cut down the trees and buſhes that incommoded them in their march. After theſe came the general's baggage, with that of his great officers, and a ſtong party of horſe for their convoy. Veſpaſian himſelf marching next, with a ſelect body of horſe and foot, ſome troops of lances, and ſix-ſcore of his own men drawn out of ſo many groſs ſquadrons. The engineers, with their machines and inſtruments for battery and aſſault took their place next, and then follow'd the tribunes and other officers, with a choice body of troops about them. Next came the imperial eagle, at the head of all the reſt of the Roman enſigns, as the prince of the birds for authority and power; an emblem of government, and a good omen of ſucceſs in arms. After the ſacred enſigns follow'd the trumpets, and after the trumpets the body of the army, ſix in front, with the proper officers to keep them in rank and file, according to order and good diſcipline. The ſervants of every legion march'd along with the infantry, and took care of the carriage and baggage. In the laſt place were the pourveyors, and other mercenaries, for the ſervice of the army, under a convoy of horſe and foot.

The order of his march.

IN this order Veſpaſian advanc'd to the frontiers of Galilee, and there encamp'd with his ſoldiers about him, earneſtly preſſing for action; but partly in confidence that the enemy's hearts would fail them upon the very approach of the army, or otherwiſe, that they might change their minds yet before it came to a battle, he gave them time to bethink themſelves; and in the interim, went in hand with his preparations for a ſiege.

THIS great general was ſo far in the right, that the Jews fell into ſuch a conſternation with dread and terror upon the very report of his coming, that Joſeph's people, who were then encamped near Sepphoris, abandon'd their captain, not only without a blow ſtriking, but without ſo much as a ſight of the enemy. Joſeph finding himſelf thus deſerted, and out of condition to encounter the Romans, the hearts of the Jews quite ſunk, the greater part of them gone over to the enemy, and the remainder in all appearance ready to follow, he quite gave over any farther thought of the war, and ſo, conſulting his own ſecurity, with ſome few that ſtood by him, he withdrew to Tiberias.

Upon Veſpaſian's advance.

Joſeph's people deſert.

Joſeph gives over the war, and withdraws to Tiberias.

CHAP. VI.

Vespasian takes Gadara by assault. The Romans put all to the sword. Joseph puts it to the council of Jerusalem, whether to fight or treat.

Vespasian takes Gadara by assault. The Romans put all to the sword.

THE first place that Vespasian attack'd, was Gadara; and he carry'd it, without any difficulty, there being no men in it to make a considerable defence. The Romans, upon forcing the town, put all to death without distinction, betwixt hatred to the Jews, and revenge for the overthrow of Cestius. They set fire not only to the city itself, but to the little towns and villages about it: laying them utterly waste, and making the inhabitants slaves.

Joseph puts it to the council of Jerusalem, whether to fight or treat.

JOSEPH's retiring for sanctuary put the Tiberians all to their wit's end, to consider, that if the case had not been desperate, he would never have fled for it. Nor were they mistaken in their opinion; for Joseph was by this time sensible of the hopeless state of the war, and that the Jews had no way in the world to save themselves but by submission and repentance. As for his own part, he made no doubt of obtaining fair quarter from the Romans if he should desire it: but rather than betray his country and his trust, he would suffer a thousand deaths, without endeavouring to make a particular friend of a publick enemy. Upon this he wrote to the principal and leading men of Jerusalem, a naked state of the case; without making the Romans either greater or less than in truth they were, for fear of puffing them up into insolence upon the Jews for cowardice one way, or provoking the Jews to be rash and inconsiderate in the ostentation of their power, in another. Joseph, in fine, remitted the matter to the council to consider of; desiring them either to send him word immediately, if they had a mind to treat; or, if they were resolv'd to prosecute the war, that they would be pleased without delay to send him an army able to give battle to the Romans. This was Joseph's letter, which he sent forthwith by an express to Jerusalem.

JOTAPATA was generally look'd upon as the strongest place in all Galilee; and Vespasian taking notice of it, and finding how the Jews in all their difficulties fled thither for sanctuary, he resolved the next thing he did to attempt the place; and so sent horse, foot, and pioneers, across the mountains to clear the ways; which were at that time craggy, and extreme difficult even for foot; but for horse utterly impassable. These pioneers, in four days, cut out a passage for the whole army to march without any trouble.

Joseph slips away out of Tiberias into Jotapata. A deserter gives Vespasian notice of it, and that Joseph was in a trap.

ON the fifth day, being the twenty first of the month * Artemisius, Joseph slipt out of Tiberias, and convey'd himself into Jotapata: which, in some measure, reviv'd the spirits of the Jews. A certain deserter presently carry'd away the news to Vespasian of Joseph's being come into the town; advising him by all means to make haste and fall on; for Joseph was now in a trap, and if he were but once secured, the war with the Jews would quickly be at an end. Vespasian was so transported at the tidings, that he look'd upon it as an immediate providence from heaven, so far to blind and infatuate the most considerable enemy they had, as to inveigle him into the noose of a voluntary bondage. Vespasian, upon this, detach'd Placidus with a thousand horse, in commission with Ebutius (one of the greatest captains for counsel and execution in the whole army) giving them orders, without delay, to invest the city, and to take all possible care that Joseph should not make his escape.

The siege of Jotapata.

VESPASIAN follow'd the next morning with the whole army, and got up to Jotapata in the afternoon: where he drew up his army on the north-side of the city, about seven † furlongs from the town; encamping upon a hill within view of the enemy, on purpose to terrify them with so dreadful a sight. This was done accordingly, and the people all seized with such an astonishment, that not a soul durst so much as look out of the walls. The Romans had had so hard a march that day, that they attempted nothing farther at present. But Vespasian however order'd the begirting of the town with two great bodies, and a third troop of horse to be posted at a distance to cut off all communication with the place. When the Jews saw how they were streighten'd and coop'd up, their very despairs enflam'd their courage; as there's no daring like that which arises from necessity.

A desperate fight all day, till night parts them.

THE next morning the Romans began to batter the walls; and the Jews at first made a vigorous resistance: but when Vespasian let loose his bowmen and slingers upon them, with all other weapons of the same kind, to force them from the walls; and when he himself at the same time, with a body of foot, assaulted the wall upon a hill over against the other, which lay more exposed to the danger of a battery; this put Joseph into such a fright for fear of the town, that he himself, at the head of the whole body of the Jews, fell outragiously upon the Romans; beat them from the walls, and follow'd the advantage with a desperate resolution. And yet the mischief they suffer'd was not inferior to what they did; being both sides equally provok'd and enflam'd: the Jews by desperation, and the Romans by indignation and shame, to find the others so near their match. There was skill and valour on the one side, against a brutal rage on the other. The fight was maintain'd all the day till night parted them. Of the Romans there were ſeveral wounded and thirteen ſlain: and a matter of ſix hundred of the Jews wounded, and ſeventeen kill'd upon the place.

A combat of five days ſucceſſively.

THE beſiegers fell on next day again; and in this encounter, they did both ſides outdo themſelves: the Jews took courage from the repulſe they had given the enemy already beyond all expectation, and the Romans from the ſhame of being held ſo long in play: for the very delay of a victory was little leſs to them than an overthrow. They fought it out five days at this rate; the beſiegers preſſing ſtill harder and harder upon them, and the Jews on the other hand, not only ſupporting the defenſe, but at the ſame time making ſallies over and above, without ſo much as minding the prodigious numbers they were to encounter. Neither did the Romans abate any thing of the vigour of their attacks, for the difficulty and hazard of the enterprize.

The ſituation of Jotapata

As to the ſituation of Jotapata, it ſtands upon a rock utterly inacceſſible; ſaving only upon one quarter: it is encompaſs'd on three ſides of it with ſuch precipices of ſteep and profound vallies, that it is enough to turn a man's brain and make him giddy, but to look down from top to bottom. There is no coming at it but upon the north; where part of the city is built upon the brow of the mountain: and that way it might be approach'd. But then Joſeph had cauſed this place to be fortify'd and taken into the town, to ſecure a mountain that overlooks and commands it; which, with other mountains there about, kept the place ſo cloſe, that there was no ſeeing of it till a body was juſt upon it. This was the ſituation and ſtrength of Jotapata.

Veſpaſian plies the ſiege, with all poſſible vigour. The manner of the attack, and defenſe.

VESPASIAN, finding that he had the natural difficulties of the place, and the rugged ſtubborneſs of the people to contend withal, took up a reſolution of puſhing the ſiege forward with more vigour, and call'd a council of his officers together, to adviſe in what manner to carry on his attack. The debate came to this iſſue, that there ſhould be erected a huge terraſs on the weakeſt part of the town. The reſolve being taken, Veſpaſian preſently ſet his whole army at work, to provide neceſſaries and materials for the raiſing of ſuch a mount; as vaſt quantities of ſtone and timber from the neighbouring mountains, with proviſions for hurdles to ſhelter the beſiegers againſt darts and ſhot from the town. Under the covert of thoſe defenſes they advanced their deſign, it being impoſſible for any ſhot from the town to do execution upon them. As for the earth they made uſe of, they had it out of the neighbourhood; and ſo handed it from one to another: inſomuch that, what with the vaſt number of hands to aſſiſt them, (for the whole army was engag'd) and the attempt going on ſtill without intermiſſion, the work could not but advance exceedingly. The Jews in the mean while did all that was poſſible, by darts and arrows from the walls, and by heavy ſtones upon their wattles, to divert them from their buſineſs: but all they were able to do, was only to make a noiſe and interrupt the proceeding, but no way to defeat or diſappoint it.

VESPASIAN had by this time an hundred and ſixty engines at work, caſting lances at the defendants; beſide larger machines to throw ſtones and javelins, artificial fires, arrows, &c. which were all manag'd by Arabians archers, and other maſters of ſhooting; and made not only the wall itſelf, but the whole ſpace alſo betwixt that and the terraſs, too hot for the defendants to approach. This did not hinder the Jews yet from ſallying out upon the Romans in troops, like thieves; ſtripping them of all their defenſes, and then falling upon them as ſo many naked men, and ſetting fire to every thing about them that was combuſtible, and by this means undoing all they had done. Veſpaſian finding the miſchief of the Jews breaking in upon them; and that there was no way to prevent it, but by making their work all of a piece, and filling up the intervals, that there might be no room for them to paſs, he went that way to work; and joining his troops in a cloſe body, put a final end to their excurſions.

The mount being now brought up almoſt to the height of the town-wall, Joſeph did not think it honourable, to have more done on the one ſide to deſtroy the town, than on the other to defend it. So that he call'd the workmen together, and gave order for the raiſing of the wall, and keeping it up ſtill above the height of the terraſs. But they excuſing themſelves, upon the impoſſibility of advancing any work under all that ſhot, Joſeph bethought himſelf of a contrivance to guard both againſt ſtones and fire: which was by driving ſeveral great ſtakes faſt into the ground, and ſtretching up ſo many raw hides againſt them; and theſe to be interpoſed betwixt the enemy and the bodies of the beſieged: the moiſture of the skins would reſiſt and damp the flame, and the yielding diſpoſition of them would enfeeble the violence of ſtones or lances, and render them in a manner ineffectual. Under the protection of this covert, the work-men follow'd it ſo hard day and night, without either fear or danger, that in a ſhort time they rais'd a wall of twenty * cubits, and fortify'd it with turrets and ſtrong embattlements. The Romans look'd upon themſelves by this time to be as good as maſters of the town; and it was therefore the greater ſurprize to meet with ſo confounding a policy, and ſo invincible an obſtinacy at the ſame time.

THE Jews took ſuch heart upon this ſtratagem and the ſucceſs of it, that they paſs'd not a day without incurſions, skirmiſhes, and all ſorts of violences, by fire, ſword and pillage. Veſpaſian was equally troubled at the diſgrace, and at the diſappointment: And therefore, upon ſecond thoughts, gave over the aſſault, and contented himſelf to endeavour the ſtarving of the place inſtead of ſtorming it; reaſoning the matter with himſelf, either that want would bring them to ſubmiſſion, or if they ſtood it out, that famine in the mean time would do the buſineſs of the ſword; either by weakening or by waſting them, and putting them out of condition of defence, whereby he might obtain the eaſier conqueſt. Veſpaſian, upon this, blockt them up ſo cloſe, that there was no paſſing in or out.

Veſpaſian attempts by ſtarving what he could not compaſs by force.

THEY had in the town, corn, and all manner of neceſſaries in abundance, ſave only ſalt. As for water, 'tis true, they had not ſo much as one fountain about the city, and only rain water for their common uſe: which, in that hot and dry country, was very ſcarce, eſpecially in ſummer; and this was their preſent caſe. It was a great affliction to them, the very thought of a drought, and the diſtreſs they were already fallen into for want of water. The place being plentifully ſtor'd with all other proviſions, and the men in good heart, Joſeph, in order to protract the ſiege, put the gariſon to their allowance, to husband the little water they had, and make the ſtock hold out ſo much the longer. This order for the ſtinting of their drink, put the people out of all patience; for it looked as if they were almoſt drawn dry; and they began to be froward upon it, and would work no longer. This peeviſh humour of the Jews could not be well kept from the knowledge of the Romans; who were within diſtance of obſerving from another hill near hand there, whatever paſs'd among the Jews: as the tumultuary thronging together, the meaſuring of their portions, and their uneaſineſs about it: ſeveral of the Jews being cut off too, upon the place, at that very inſtant, by ſhot from the Roman engines. The pit-water being by this time well nigh ſpent, and Veſpaſian in an hourly expectance of the town's falling into his hands, Joſeph put this amuſement upon him. He caus'd a great many parcels of cloaths to be hung up dropping-wet, upon the battlements of the walls within view of the Romans; wherein he gain'd his end of inducing them to believe that there could not be ſuch a ſcarcity of water, in a place where they were ſo laviſh of it: and upon that preſumption, they fell into a direct deſpondency of ever taking the place for want of water.

No proviſion wanting in Jotapata but water.

An invention to conceal the want of water.

Nay, Veſpaſian himſelf gave over all hope of carrying it by a ſiege; and ſo had recourſe once again to arms. The Jews, on the other ſide, were heartily glad of it; for they themſelves, and their city, were both brought to the laſt extremity, and deſir'd nothing more than to exchange a ſtarving calamity, for want of bread and water, for an honourable death in the field. While Joſeph was pondering about an expedient to remedy this inconvenience, it came into his head, that, on the weſt ſide of the town, there was a forlorn hollow gutter, that lay quite out of the way, ſo as no body minded it. Joſeph propounded by the convenience of this paſſage to get relief into the town, as water, and whatever elſe they wanted; and to that end he wrote to ſome of the out-lying Jews, that liv'd toward that quarter, to ſend him from time to time what ſupplies he had occaſion for; together with expreſs inſtructions to cover the meſſengers with hair-skins, and then to have them creep upon all-fours: ſo that if the watch ſhould get any glimpſe of them, they might paſs for dogs, or ſome other four-footed animals. This had effect till the correſpondence was diſcover'd, and the communication cut off.

Veſpaſian returns to his arms again.

Joſeph finds out a way for relief.

JOSEPH ſaw by this time, that it was a thing utterly impoſſible to defend the city, and that it would be certain death to him if he ſtay'd: ſo that he himſelf and ſeveral other great men, met preſently in council upon it, and conſulted how to make their eſcape. The people had already a jealouſy of what they were about; and ſo came to Joſeph in throngs, and begged of him above all things in this world to take care of them, for they had no other friend to truſt to but himſelf. They could never be loſt, they ſaid, ſo long as he was ſafe; nor their lives better ſpent than at his feet: or, if they ſhould be all ſeiz'd upon, it would be recorded to his eternal honour, that he was too brave either to fly from his enemies, or to abandon his friends: which would be much the caſe they ſaid, as if a man ſhould leap out of a ſhip in a ſtorm, which he had taken charge of in a calm: telling him that this caſe of a veſſel was the very ſame with that of their city; for, ſaid they, who ſhall ſtand up to defend us and our country, when we have loſt the ſingle man, whom we look upon as the only means and hope of our ſafety?

Joſeph propounds an eſcape.

The Jews beg of him to ſtand by them.

JOSEPH was not willing to have it thought, that he conſulted altogether his particular ſecurity; and ſo gave them to underſtand in a plauſible diſcourſe, that it was more for their ſakes than his own, that he had any thought of withdrawing; for either you will be made priſoners, ſays he, or you will not: and now take it which way you will. If the latter, what will you be the better for my ſtaying with you? If the other, what will you be the better for my dying with you? Whereas, if I were then at liberty and abroad, I might bring an army into the field out of Galilee time enough to raiſe the ſiege: now ſo long as I lie coop'd up here in the town, I ſhall certainly do you a great deal of miſchief without any ſort of good; for it will irritate the Romans to a more vigorous proſecution of the ſiege, ſo long as they are ſure of Joſeph for a prize; but if I were out of the way once, they would look no farther after you perhaps.

Joſeph reaſons the matter with them in a plauſible diſcourſe.

The Jews continue their importunities.

THE people were ſo far from coming over to him upon this diſcourſe, that they came ſtill preſſing upon him with more and more importunity: men, women and children; mothers with their infants at their breaſts all in tears, embracing his knees, and caſting themſelves at his feet; begging of him with outcries and ſupplications, not to forſake them in their diſtreſs. And this they did not, I preſume, out of envy to his being at eaſe; but upon ſome ſecret impulſe, as if the very preſence of Joſeph would be a kind of protection to his friends.

JOSEPH's heart was ſo far ſoften'd toward theſe people, betwixt gratitude and compaſſion, that he put it to a queſtion within himſelf, whether to ſtay or go. "If I appear to ſtay "willingly, ſays he, it will be taken as the "power of the aſcendant they have over me. "But what if I ſhould refuſe, and then be "forc'd to do it at laſt by being made a pri-"ſoner"? Upon this deliberation, Joſeph reſolv'd to ſtand it out with them, and bear his part in the common deſperation of the city. "This, my good friends and countrymen, ſays "he, is the true time to ſhew ourſelves brave "in, when there's no hope of ſafety but in our "arms; when we are ſure to receive honour "in exchange for our lives, and for acting "like good patriots, to have our memories cele-"brated to poſterity for our country's devo-"tees".

Joſeph deliberates and enters into action.

FROM theſe words Joſeph advanc'd to action, and putting himſelf at the head of the braveſt men he had, charg'd the enemy's guards, beat them from their trenches, and puſh'd them up to the very camp: one while tearing their skins to pieces that cover'd them in their works; another while ſetting fire to the works themſelves: and this they did time after time, for three or four days and nights ſucceſſively, with an inſuperable boldneſs, and an indefatigable labour.

WHEN Veſpaſian ſaw how hard it went with the Romans upon theſe encounters; for when they were worſted, they were aſham'd to turn their backs; and when they got the better of it at any time, they were too heavy arm'd to purſue the advantage: ſo that the Jews never ſally'd but they did ſome miſchief or other before they retreated: when Veſpaſian, I ſay, found upon what terms they were, he commanded his troops to give over the attack, and not caſt away their lives againſt men that did but deſire to die, under the provocation of an incurable deſpair. Their rage, he ſaid, was but like a blaze that would go out of itſelf, if it wanted but matter to entertain it: beſide, that the caſe of the Romans was quite a different thing from that of the Jews; the former fought only for dominion, the other, for life and liberty; and the one had a great deal more need of victory than the other. But in the mean time the Arabian and the Syrian ſlingers, archers, engineers, &c. were all at work with their ſtones, arrows and lances: and nothing, in fine, of that kind ceaſed, as the Jews found to their coſt. But all this was ſo far from ſtaggering the Jews, that on the contrary, they preſs'd through all difficulties to ſingle out the Romans, body to body; and there fought it out, without quarter on either hand; and the living on both ſides, ſtepping up to ſupply the place of the dead.

Veſpaſian bids his men give over the aſſault.

A deſcription of the battering engine the ram. The manner of ordering it. A contrivance to defeat the force of it. The Jews have recourſe to fire. A brave action of one Eleazar. Two glorious heroes. Veſpaſian receives a ſlight wound on the ancle. The ſtrange force of battery. A bloody night, for the loſs of brave men. The Jews ſtand firm to the laſt.

BETWIXT the length of the ſiege, and the perpetual excurſions of the beſieged, Veſpaſian was as good as beſieg'd himſelf: but having now carry'd up his works near the height of the walls, he reſolved to bring it then to an iſſue by the dint of battery, and order'd the battering ram to be brought up to the place of action. This ram is a machine of a prodigious bulk and ſize, like the maſt of a ſhip, fortify'd with a ſtrong piece of iron at the top of it, like the head of a ram: from whence, and from the manner of puſhing in the uſe of it, like the butting of that creature, it took the name. This engine is hung up by the middle, with great cables or ropes, faſten'd to croſs timbers, well cramp'd together and ſtrongly ſupported. There it lies upon a poiſe, like the beam of a pair of ſcales: and as it hangs balancing thus in the air, it is mov'd backward and forward by the force of many hands, and falls with ſuch a violence upon the place, where it is to batter, that no fortreſs or wall is able to ſtand the continu'd repetitions of its attack.

A deſcription of the ram.

VESPASIAN grew impatient with delay, and the ſiege ſeem'd a kind of idleneſs to the Romans; whereas the Jews at the ſame time were ſtill doing of miſchief; ſo that the general's heart was now ſet altogether upon diſpatch. The firſt thing he did in order to it, was to bring his ſlingers, archers and ordinary machines cloſer up to the town, to beat the defendants from the walls, and to make way for the ram; which was then immediately brought on: that is to ſay, ſo ſoon as the archers and ſlingers had repuls'd the Jews from the walls. It was cover'd with hurdles, and wrapt up in hair skins, for the ſecurity both of the managers, and of the machine. The very firſt ſtroke of it put the people into an uproar, as if the town had been taken; and Joſeph finding that their battering ſtill in the ſame place, would bring down the wall over their heads in a very ſhort time, he order'd ſeveral ſacks of chaff to be provided, and let down by ropes from the battlement againſt the place where the engine play'd: and ſtill as the Romans chang'd their battery, the Jews encounter'd them with their ſacks; by which means they did generally either miſs their mark, or fail of the effect.

The manner of ordering the ram.

A contrivance to defeat the force of the ram

THIS invention was a mighty hindrance to the Romans; for which way ſoever they pointed the engine, the Jews would be ſure to meet them with their chaff-bags, which ſcreen'd the wall from receiving damage from the blow; till the Romans found out another way to defeat the contrivance. That is to ſay, they got a proviſion of long poles, with ſharp iron hooks faſten'd to the ends of them, like paring knives; and with theſe they immediately cut the ſtrings of the bags; and upon this diſappointment, the machine did its office again; and the wall being

The Jews have recourse to fire being but newly repair'd and not yet ſettled, could not poſſibly withſtand its force. Joſeph and his companions had now nothing left them to truſt to but fire, ſo that getting together all the combuſtible matter they could lay hands on, beſide pitch, ſulphur, and the like; they divided it ſeverally into three parcels, and ſet fire to the Roman machines, huts, and all materials that would take it, in three ſeveral places at the ſame time. The rage of the flames and of the Jews was ſo terrible, that there was no place for relief, and the danger equal of periſhing both ways. The conflagration, in fine, was ſo dreadful, that it deſtroy'd all in a moment that the Romans had been ſo long a doing, and with ſo much labour and hazard.

The bravery of one Eleazar.

THERE was one Eleazar of Paab in Galilee, the ſon of Sameas, who ſignaliz'd himſelf upon this occaſion by an action never to be forgotten, and hath conſequently a right to a part in this hiſtory. He took up a mighty ſtone and caſt it down from the wall upon the machine, with ſo prodigious a force, that he broke off the iron head of it: and then leaping down into the middle of his enemies, carry'd it off without any apprehenſion of danger, to the foot of the wall; where he ſtood a while, unarmed as he was, a common mark for the enemy, till he had five arrows ſtuck in his body. In this condition, he remounted the wall; where he ſtood for a ſhort time a glorious ſpectacle, without any change either of countenance or behaviour, till at laſt he dropp'd down dead with the anguiſh of his wounds, and the head of the machine in his arms, which he would never quit to the laſt.

The glorious heroes.

THERE were alſo two brothers of Ruma in Galilee, *Netiras and Philip, that were as brave as it was poſſible for men to be. They fell once upon the ſoldiers of the tenth legion, with ſuch an impetuous fury, that they broke into the Roman army, and drove all before them that made head againſt them; while Joſeph at the head of a troop of men, with firebrands, burnt the machines, huts, and works of the fifth, and likewiſe of the tenth legion; and thoſe that follow'd made the ſame havock with what was left.

BY the evening of the ſame day, the Romans were at work with the ſame engine again, upon that part of the wall that had been ſhatter'd and broken before: Veſpaſian at the ſame time receiving a ſhot upon the ankle by an arrow out of the town; but it prov'd a ſlight wound however, for the arrow was ſpent. They that were within diſtance of ſeeing their general's blood, put the whole army into ſuch a fright with the alarum, that the very commanders themſelves quitted their poſts, and came thronging to the head quarter to learn the truth of the matter; Titus himſelf, in the firſt place, out of an impatient tenderneſs for his father: but this generous zeal caſt the multitude into a conſternation. Veſpaſian however quickly eas'd both Titus and the army of their fears, by ſhewing himſelf openly, and upon the main making little or nothing of the diſaſter. So that the anxiety and ſorrow they labour'd under before, for fear of a mortal calamity, was now turn'd only into the tranſport of an honourable revenge: Veſpaſian encouraging the ſoldiers, and they one another, to fall on and renew the aſſault, in defiance of all oppoſition. The enemies ſtones and arrows deſtroy'd great numbers of the Jews; but Joſeph and his people made good the wall ſtill; and with fire, ſword, and other inſtruments of miſchief, lay galling the managers of the battering engine. The Jews now, with all their bravery, advanc'd little yet, in regard that they were forced to fight in ſight of the enemy; and the fire they made uſe of againſt the Romans, gave the enemy light againſt themſelves: ſo that they ſtood ſo fair a mark, that there was no miſſing it on the one ſide, and no avoiding it on the other; for they could not ſo much as ſee the very machines from whence the weapons came. By the force of ſtones from thoſe engines, the very battlements and the corners of the towers were broken down; and where they fell into a body, they carry'd away whole files before them. But whoever would be inform'd of the wonderful effect of theſe machines, needs never look farther than into the hiſtory of that night.

The ſtrange force of theſe battering engines.

THERE was one of Joſeph's friends, who, as he was upon the walls of Jotapata with him, had his head ſtruck off with a ſtone from one of theſe engines; which was carry'd three † furlongs from the place, as if it had been thrown out of a ſling. And another, coming croſs a big-belly'd woman, carry'd the child within her half a ‡ furlong from the body. Now taking all this together; the prodigious violence and the terrible clattering of theſe machines, and of the weapons they caſt; the frequent noiſes of the dead and wounded falling from the walls; the ſhrieks and cries of women within the town, anſwer'd by the groans of dying perſons from without; the town-ditch flowing with blood and fill'd with piles of carcaſſes, ſufficient to mount an enemy to the aſſault; and the echoes from the mountains, after all this, redoubling the miſerable ſtory: there was nothing wanting that ſorrowful night, in fine, that might ſtrike the eye or the ear with an inexpreſſible horror. There was a prodigious ſlaughter of brave men in that night's action, in a moſt heroical defenſe of the liberty of their country; which they maintain'd all night againſt the uttermoſt efforts of the enemy's machines, till break of day; and then the wall fell to pieces. But the Jews even in this diſmal extremity made the breach good yet, with their bodies and their arms, before the Romans could paſs their men over the ditch to the attack.

Veſpaſian makes ready to renew the aſſault.

WHEN the Roman army had a little refreſh'd themſelves next morning after the fatigue of ſo ſevere a night, Veſpaſian put every thing in a readineſs for an aſſault, taking care in the firſt place to keep the Jews from daring to ſhew themſelves in the breach. To this end, he diſmounted a party of the beſt horſe he had; armed them at all points, and ſo ranged them in three diviſions, with pikes in their hands, to make good the breach; and they themſelves, upon the advance of the bridges, to be the firſt to enter the town. Theſe horſe were to be ſeconded by a body of choice foot, and the remainder of the horſe to be diſtributed quite round the mountainous parts of the city, to make ſure that, upon the taking of it, no perſon ſhould eſcape. The next in order were the archers, ready prepar'd with their bows and arrows; as alſo the ſlingers and engineers. Others were employ'd with ladders, to attempt the ſcaling of ſome parts of the wall that were entire; which was intended only for an amuſement, and to draw off aſſiſtance from other places that more needed it, and to force them by this diverſion to abandon the attack.

Joſeph prepares for the encounter.

JOSEPH was ſo well informed of the Roman's purpoſes and deſigns, that he employ'd only men that were either over-much fatigu'd, or ſuperannuated, for the guard of thoſe parts of the wall that were ſound; well knowing there was little or no danger from that quarter. But wherever there was the leaſt crack or flaw, not a man was made uſe of for that duty but of approv'd courage and reſolution; and he himſelf with ſix more at the head of them, to receive the firſt ſhock of the enemy; giving them in charge not to mind the outcries of inſulting clamours, but rather to ſhut their ears againſt them; for they were all but noiſe. As for their archers, the ſhields over their heads were the beſt defence againſt their arrows: or they might retreat a little till they had empty'd their quivers. "But, ſays Joſeph, if they come once to lay over their bridges, there's nothing then to be thought of but fighting; and not as people in defence of a country that is to be preſerved, but for the honour and vindication of a country that is already loſt, and to make the authors of your ruin pay dear for their purchace. For what can you expect, upon the ſubduing of your city, but that your adverſaries will gratify their cruelty, with the blood of your fathers, your wives and your children?" After this manner Joſeph divided himſelf.

And gives his people their leſſon.

WHEN the common people, the women and the children, ſaw the town ſurrounded by three armies, (and no force ſent out to encounter them) the enemy marching up with their drawn ſwords towards the de moliſh'd ſide of the wall, the mountains round about glittering with arms, and the Arabians prepar'd with their arrows, they ſet up ſuch an howl, as if the city were not only in danger of ruin, but already taken. Theſe clamours were ſo moving, that Joſeph preſently order'd the women to their houſes, and to ſilence at their peril, for fear of diſheartening the ſoldiers; while he himſelf haſten'd to that part of the town that fell to his lot, paſſing by the ſcaling ladders without ſo much as minding them; his thoughts being altogether taken up with the enemy's way of attack by their darts and their arrows.

A horrid confuſion of outcries on the approach of the army.

UPON the ſounding of their trumpets, the giving of the ſignal, and the military ſhout of of the army, the very ſky was darken'd with a cloud of arrows. Joſeph's companions did not forget their inſtructions, but ſtopp'd their ears againſt the clamours, and covered themſelves with their ſhields againſt their ſhot. But upon the leaſt advance of the bridges, they flew upon the Romans like lightening, to put a ſtop to the deſign, either by keeping them from approaching, or by beating them off and diſputing every inch of the poſſeſſion. For as faſt as the Romans endeavour'd to mount the bridge, the Jews violently puſh'd them down again, with ſignal inſtances both of their skill and courage, in the conduct and execution; ſhewing themſelves as bold and intrepid in the extremity of danger, as the Romans were where there was none at all; nay, the greater hazard, the firmer was their reſolution; and when they were once engag'd, there was no parting them without the death of the one or the other. But the Jews being kept upon perpetual duty, and no enforcements to relieve them, whereas the Romans had a continual ſupply of freſh men, and as one party was weary'd, or worſted, another at hand ready to take the place, numbers muſt of neceſſity carry it at the long run. The Romans were ſenſible of the advantage they had; and ſo preſſing as cloſe together as one could ſtand to another, they threw their long bucklers over their backs, and making an impenetrable figure, they drove the Jews before them, as if the ſtrength of the whole army had been united into one entire body; and ſo they advanced up to the very wall.

Joſeph's men keep to their orders.

A bloody conflict betwixt the Jews and the Romans.

The Romans advance up to the wall, under covert of their bucklers.

IN this diſtreſs, Joſeph, upon advice with his neceſſities and deſpairs, reſolved upon a trial of this experiment. The Jews having a great deal of oil by them, Joſeph ordered the boiling a conſiderable quantity of it; and ſo to caſt it down ſcalding hot upon the ſoldiers under the wall, together with the very pots and veſſels it was boil'd in. This was done accordingly, and paſſing between the bucklers, and over the bodies of the Romans, it utterly broke their order, and deſtroy'd the men, by forcing them down from the wall in extreme torture: for the oil flowing under their arms from head to foot, and ſo all over the body, conſum'd the fleſh like fire itſelf; being naturally apt to take heat, and long a cooling. And then their armour being brac'd and buckl'd to their bodies, there was no getting clear of the torment: ſome of them leaping and ſpringing in their pains; others drawn double, and all falling from the bridge down to the ground.

The Jews pour down ſcalding oil among them.

And for thoſe that attempted to get off to their own people, they were eaſily maſter'd by the Jews at their backs.

The ſtrange courage and conſtancy of the Romans.

In the whole courſe of theſe calamitous circumſtances, there was no failing either of courage in the Romans, or of prudence in the Jews. For the Romans, notwithſtanding the miſery they endur'd by the ſcalding oil, had the heart yet to preſs upon thoſe that pour'd it among them, and not without a competition who ſhould be foremoſt. The Jews, after this, put another check to the progreſs of the Romans by caſting boil'd fenugreek upon the boards of the bridge; which made them ſo ſlippery that the Romans could not keep their feet upon them; ſo that they could neither fight nor fly. Some fell at their length upon the planks, where they were trampled upon by their own people; others fell lower, where they lay at the mercy of the Jews ſhot. Veſpaſian found his people ſo haraſs'd out by this way of fighting, that toward evening he call'd them off; having loſt ſeveral men, and more wounded. Of Jotapata there were only ſix men ſlain, and upwards of three hundred hurt. This action paſſed the twentieth of the month Deſius.

Veſpaſian orders the raiſing of his platforms.

Veſpaſian was ſo ſenſible of the miſcarriage of this aſſault, that he treated the army with an excuſatory compliment upon that occaſion; but finding the ſoldiers ſo far from being dejected, that they were rather inflam'd, and that they had more mind to be fighting than talking, he order'd the raiſing of his platforms, and the erecting three wooden towers upon them, of fifty foot high a piece, cover'd all over with iron to keep them ſteady with the weight, and make them proof againſt fire. In theſe turrets were the choiceſt of his markſmen and engineers, with their machines, inſtruments and arms. The people in them had this advantage of the beſieged, that they were out of ſight and reach of the others: whereas thoſe upon the wall were eaſily ſeen and wounded from the turrets. So that the Jews, being neither able to avoid the arrows from above, nor ſo much as to ſee who hurt them, quitted the breach; but ſtill upon all attacks made a vigorous and a brave reſiſtance. At this rate did Jotapata defend itſelf, tho' with daily loſs of men, and with much more hazzard and miſchief to themſelves than to the enemy.

The Jews are forc'd to quit the breach.

VESPASIAN being given to underſtand, that Japha, a neighbouring city to Jotapata, after the example of the other, was falling off from their duty, being encouraged thereto by the famous defence of that place, that held out beyond all expectation; he ſent Trajan the commander of the tenth legion, with two thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, to reduce them. But finding the town impregnably fortify'd, (for beſide the natural ſtrength of the ſituation, it was encompas'd with a double wall) he was encounter'd upon the way, by the inhabitants of the place, in a poſture to give him battle. The bodies join'd, and after a ſlight reſiſtance, Trajan put them to flight, and purſu'd them ſo cloſe to the outwall (which was the place they made to) that they fell in with them pell-mell into the firſt encloſure; but upon preſſing up to the ſecond wall, the townſmen ſhut the gates upon them, for fear of taking in both friend and foe, one with another. This extraordinary way of delivering up the Galileans into the hands of the Romans, was a moſt judicial providence of heaven; for theſe men to be ſhut out of their own gates by their own people, and given up for a ſacrifice to an enemy that thirſted for their blood. They crouded in throngs up to the gates, call'd to the officers by their names, and begg'd admittance; having their throats cut at the ſame time, with their very prayers betwixt their lips. The Romans kept one gate, and the citizens the other; and of thoſe that were coopt up in this encloſure, ſome laid violent hands upon themſelves, others fell by the ſwords of their companions; beſides an incredible number, that fell by the hands of the Romans; and not a man amongſt them that had the heart to lift up a hand, or ſo much as offer at a revenge: for over and above the dread of an enemy, their ſpirits were taken down with a ſenſe of treachery among themſelves. They dy'd, in fine, to the number of twelve thouſand perſons; and all curſing the Jews, not the Romans.

Trajan took it now for granted, that their martial men were in a manner all cut off; and for thoſe that were left, that they were ſo diſpirited as not to have the heart to reſiſt: ſo that he ſent away preſently to deſire Veſpaſian, that his ſon Titus might have the honour of finiſhing the work. Veſpaſian underſtood it of ſomething conſiderable that remain'd yet to be done; and ſo Titus was diſpatch'd away accordingly, with an enforcement of five hundred horſe and a thouſand foot; which he divided immediately, upon his arrival, into two attacks; that on the left-hand he gave to Trajan, and the right-hand diviſion he commanded himſelf. The firſt thing that the Romans did, after this, was to plant ſcaling-ladders, and then to mount the wall upon all quarters at the ſame time. The Galileans made ſome faint reſiſtance for a while; but ſoon quitting the wall, Titus with his party preſently leap'd down after them and enter'd the town. It came now to a deſperate ſtreet-fight; which, betwixt ambuſhes, and ſallies from nooks and narrow paſſes, where a great number of ſturdy fellows were got together, and annoyances of all ſorts that they receiv'd from the very women upon the tops of the houſes, continued for ſix hours. But the ſoldiers being by this time all cut off, the remainder of the multitude, whether at home or in the field, young men and old, were all deſtroy'd indifferently, and not a male left alive but infants, who were carry'd away captives with the women. The Samaritans upon mount Garizim meditate a rebellion. Vespasian sends Cerealis to take care of it. The Samaritans in a formidable body. A mortal drought for want of water. An indemnity offer'd by Cerealis, and rejected. The people put to death every man of them.

The Samaritans upon mount Garizim meditate a rebellion.

THE Samaritans bore their part also in the publick calamity. They had their meeting upon mount Garizim; (the holy mountain, as they counted it) and there they waited in their places for the event of things: but in the mean time the very air of the assembly, and the manner of their behaviour, look'd with a seditious aspect, and gave to understand what they would be at. For they were never the wiser for example and experience: but, without considering either their own weakness, or the mighty and prosperous power of the Romans, they were at that time running headlong into a rebellion; but Vespasian took an early care to prevent the mischief. For though the whole province of Samaria was in a manner beset with garisons, he was not yet without some apprehension of what such a multitude of people, and such a conspiracy of ill affections, might produce; so that for fear of the worst, he sent away Cerealis, a tribune of the fifth legion, with six hundred horse, and three thousand foot, to take care of the publick.

Vespasian sends Cerealis to take care of it.

The Samaritans in a formidable body.

WHEN Cerealis came up with his troops to this mountain, he found the Samaritans gather'd together there in so vast a body, that he did not think fit to attack them upon that post; but rather intrench'd himself round about them at the foot of it; where for that day they were as good as besieg'd. It so fell out, that being now in the height of summer, and a very hot season, the Samaritans were in great want of water (the country having made no provision to supply it) insomuch, that there died some or other of them daily of a parching drought; others went over to the Romans, chusing rather to suffer slavery, than so miserable a death. Cerealis being informed by deserters, that they that stood it out were as much broken and out of heart as their fellows, he advanced up the mountain, and besetting the enemy round with his army, did not only offer them life and liberty, upon condition of laying down their arms, but intreated them, with all the courtesy imaginable, to accept of the indemnity that was offer'd, upon an assurance that it should be made good. But they were not to be prevail'd upon; and so they were all put to the sword, to the number of eleven thousand and six hundred persons. There escap'd not so much as one man of them: this happen'd on the twenty seventh of the month * Desius. And thus were the Samaritans humbled.

The Romans works are now finish'd. A deserter gives Vespasian intelligence of the state of the town; with advice to fall on about break of day. Vespasian considers of it, takes his time, and carries it. The particulars of the action. An inhuman cruelty. A base and a treacherous murder. Forty thousand men kill'd in the siege; the city ras'd, and the castles burnt.

THE people of Jotapata held out a long time, and stood firm against all extremities, with a constancy to admiration. But upon the forty seventh day, when the Romans had carry'd up their works above the heighth of the walls, Vespasian had an account brought him by a deserter of the state of the town; which was, that what with the loss of men, watching, and hard duty, the garison was so weaken'd, that with one sharp assault more, the Romans might certainly carry the place; or, which would be the easier way, it was but taking the right opportunity to surprize them. So the deserter advis'd Vespasian to take his time about break of day; when he might be sure to find them less watchful; and the guard so drowsy and tir'd, that he could hardly fail of carrying his point.

The Romans works being now finish'd, a deserter gives Vespasian notice of the state of the town, and advises him to fall on about break of day.

VESPASIAN was so well acquainted with the obstinate fidelity of the Jews one to another, and with the greatness of their resolution in case of force or torments, that he gave little or no credit to this fugitive, for the sake of an instance he had seen of a wonderful constancy of mind in one of that city already. He was a prisoner of Jotapata; and being put to the question about the condition of the town, he stood all manner of tortures, even to fire and the cross itself, to the contempt of death in all forms, rather than make the least discovery. But the thing not being very unlikely, Vespasian thought with himself that it might yet possibly be true; or, at the worst, that he should run no risque at all in seeming to believe it. Upon this consideration, he order'd the informer to be taken into custody, and every thing to be made ready for the assault.

Vespasian considers of it, takes his time, and carries his point.

AT the hour assign'd, the army made a silent march up to the walls; Titus at the head of it, with Domitius and Sabinus, and some chosen men out of the fifteenth legion. They kill'd the centinels, cut the throats of the guards, enter'd the city; and after them follow'd Sextus Cerealis the tribune, and Placidus, with the troops under their command. The Romans were now in possession of the fort, masters of the town; and though it was broad day-light, yet the garison were so spent with labour and overwatching, that to this instant they did not not so much as know the town was taken. Nay, those that were awake, were almost as much to seek too as the rest: for there fell such a mist at that very instant, that either they saw nothing at all, or they did not know what they saw. This fogg continu'd till the whole army were enter'd the place: the people never waking till they felt the danger, and till they were convinc'd by dying that they were undone. The Romans had suffer'd too much in the siege, to have any sense of mercy or tenderness upon the storm. Some were thrown head-long down, in the heat of the action, from the top of the fort to the bottom; others, that wanted neither goodwill nor resolution to revenge themselves, were press'd to death in crowds, or forced down precipices, or dash'd to pieces with ruin from over their heads. This was the case of several of Joseph's select friends; who chose rather to die by their own hands, than by the hand of an enemy; and to lay violent hands on themselves, when they could not have the satisfaction of taking a Roman along with them. This was it that mov'd divers of them to withdraw together into a remote part of the city, and there to do the last office one for another.

THOSE of the guard that took the first notice of the town's being lost, got into a certain turret toward the north; where they were assaulted, and for a while made resistance: but being overborn with numbers, they offer'd to treat; and finding no terms would be allow'd them, they were cut to pieces upon the place, and fell like men of bravery and honour. This action clos'd the siege; and the day had pass'd without one drop of Roman blood, if it had not been for the death of Anthony a centurion, who was basely and treacherously kill'd. There were several of the Jews that fled into caves; and one of them call'd out to Anthony for quarter, and his right-hand upon it, as an obligation of honour for the performance of the condition. Anthony unwarily stretching forth his right-hand for the Jew's satisfaction, the other stabb'd him into the groin with a spear, and so destroy'd him.

A base and treacherous murder.

THE Romans kill'd all they met that day, without sparing so much as one man: and for some days following, they search'd all the hiding-places, vaults, and cellars they could hear off, for fugitives; putting all to death they could lay hands on, saving only women and children. The number of the prisoners was twelve hundred, and of the slain from the beginning of the siege to the end was forty thousand. Vespasian order'd the city to be ras'd, and the castles to be all burnt. Jotapata, in fine, was taken the first of the month * Panemus, in the thirteenth year of Nero: and this was the manner of taking it.

Forty thousand men kill'd in the siege; the city ras'd, and the castles burnt.

Vespasian seems not to heed it at first, till the truth of the prediction comes afterward to be confirm'd. Vespasian returns to Ptolemais, and so to Cesarea.*

A strict search for Joseph, dead or alive.

THE Romans every where made a most strict and diligent search after Joseph; partly out of a personal animosity to him, and in part out of an officious forwardness to oblige Vespasian, who look'd upon him as the main support of the war. They search'd for him both among the dead and living, and in all places where the body of a man might be conceal'd. But it was his good hap, upon the taking of the town, to make his escape through the very middle of his enemies, and to get at last into an old deep pit, with a passage that led out of it into a large cavern, which was not to be discern'd from above. In this cave, Joseph found forty eminent persons under his own circumstances, with provisions about them for several days. Now the enemy being master of the whole country thereabouts, Joseph was fain to keep close in the day-time; but went abroad still in the night, to observe the enemies guards, and see what possibility there was of making an escape. The watches, it seems, were so strict and vigilant, that there was no getting away; and that it was for his sake too that they made this scrutiny. Upon this, he went back again to his retreat, and there lay still a while. On the third day after this, he was betray'd by a woman that was taken up; and Vespasian, immediately upon this discovery, sent two tribunes to him, Paulinus and Gallicanus, to invite him out of his hole; with an assurance, upon the general's word and honour, that he should be fairly treated. Joseph durst not trust so far to the Roman generosity, as to venture himself upon the general's parole; but, being conscious to himself of the mischief he had done them, he had more reason, he thought, to expect a revenge than a favour; and so excused himself from complying with the proposal. Vespasian, after this, sent him a third tribune, one Nicanor, Joseph's old friend and acquaintance. This Nicanor treated Joseph at large, upon the generous humanity of the victorious Romans towards those they had subdu'd: assuring him moreover, that they were so far from bearing him any ill-will for the hurt he had done them, by the bravery and gallantry of his conduct; that, on the contrary, they had a high esteem of him for his virtues. "And besides, says Nicanor, what should Vespasian need to stand expostulating with Joseph upon conditions, when he has it absolutely in his power to do whatever he will with him already? Vespasian loves a worthy man, and he has a mind to oblige Joseph, as a person of that character. Or can you imagine now, that if the general had any mean and dishonourable view, he would ever have employ'd a friend to execute the office of a rascal; or have wrapt up so black a villany under so illustrious a covert? Or do you think again, that even I myself, if I had been put upon it, would ever have submitted to be an instrument in so foul a treachery?" Notwithstanding the reasonableness of Nicanor's arguments, Joseph still made difficulties of coming over, and heſitated ſo long, that the Roman ſoldiers had certainly in a rage ſet fire to the cave, if Veſpaſian had not reſtrained them, by a ſuggeſtion that he was reſolved to get Joſeph alive into his hands. Nicanor all this while continued to preſs Joſeph into a compliance, with inſtances more and more: the rage and menaces alſo of the ſoldiers ſtill encreaſing with their number. This brought to Joſeph's mind certain dreams he had; wherein God had revealed to him the miſerable calamities that were to betide the Jews, and the proſperity and greatneſs of the Romans. For Joſeph had an extraordinary gift of expounding dreams, and the faculty of interpreting many of thoſe ſecrets that God had been pleaſed to couch under veil and myſtery. As he was a prieſt himſelf, and of the ſacerdotal race, he was a perſon perfectly well skill'd in the writings of the holy prophets: and in this very inſtant, as if the ſpirit of God had taken poſſeſſion of him, the whole courſe and order of his viſions recurr'd to his mind; and particularly thoſe horrid images that he had lately ſeen, as well as the reſt. And in this rapture, he addreſs'd himſelf in a prayer to almighty God to this effect. "Great God! "(ſays he) ſince it is thy bleſſed will to de- "preſs the Jews, and to exalt the Romans, "and to make me the inſtrument to foretel "thy purpoſe, I ſubmit myſelf to thy provi- "dence, and to the acceptance of my life up- "on condition of rendring myſelf to the Ro- "mans: but in the preſence of thy ſacred ma- "jeſty, I do likewiſe declare, that I do it as "the miniſter of thy good pleaſure, and not "as a betrayer of my country."

Joſeph calls to mind dreams and revelations of times paſt.

Joſeph delivers himſelf up to the Romans.

JOSEPH had no ſooner ſurrendered himſelf to Nicanor, but all his companions in the cave came up to him, and attack'd him with clamorous invectives and exclamations. "What is be- "come of the laws of our country, they cry'd, "or of the honour of our profeſſion? The "ſpirit of our anceſtors, and that primitive "vigour of the Jews, that with the firſt "breath of life drew in a contempt of death? "and can Joſeph be ſo fond of that life too, "as ever to think of looking the ſun in the "face, and ſee himſelf a ſlave? why does he "not act according to the doctrine and prac- "tiſe he has taught? He has hitherto preach- "ed and recommended liberty to others, and "now renounces it himſelf. You were cer- "tainly very much miſtaken, they cry'd, in "the meaſures you took of true wiſdom and "courage; either if you could hope for quarter "where you have ſo little deſerv'd it, or if "you can ſink ſo low as to accept of life up- "on diſhonourable terms. But however the "fortune of Rome may fright you into a for- "getfulneſs of yourſelf, it ſhall never make "us depart from the duty we owe to the good "of our nation: and we have yet hearts and "ſwords ready to ſtand by you in that quar- "rel. Or if you are otherwiſe reſolv'd, you "have it now at your choice, whether you "will die a general of the Jews, or the death "of a coward and a traytor. Fall upon your "own ſword, and you do the former; or "leave it to us, and it will be the latter: for "the work is to be done however."

A generous invective againſt Joſeph.

The deſperate reſolution of the Jews.

They had no ſooner utter'd theſe words, but they all drew upon him, and threaten'd to kill him that inſtant, if he ſubmitted to the Romans. Joſeph had ſo ſcrupulous a fear upon him, leſt he ſhould be taken off before he could acquit himſelf of what he had in charge from almighty God to communicate to the nation of the Jews, that he enter'd into a reaſoning of the caſe in words to this effect.

Joſeph expoſtulates the matter with his companions.

"WHAT can be the meaning, my good "friends and companions, of this deſperate "reſolution you have taken of laying violent "hands upon yourſelves, and of ſetting the "two deareſt friends in nature at variance, "the ſoul and the body? But am I chang'd, "do you ſay? Ask the Romans. Is it a glo- "rious fate to die in war? It is ſo undoubt- "edly, if it be in a war that is manag'd ac- "cording to the law of arms: that is to ſay, "where a man falls by the hand of the con- "queror. Neither ſhould I make any more "conſcience of killing myſelf than of deſiring "a Roman to do it; but yet if the Romans "have a mind to ſpare an enemy, ſhall that "enemy on the other hand be ſo cruel as not "to ſpare himſelf? Or ſo fooliſh, as to be "more rigorous in his own caſe, than he would "have an enemy to be. No man dies ſo great, "'tis true, as he that ſacrifices his life to his "liberty; but then it muſt be in arms, and in "the act of contending for it; and that life "taken away in the conteſt, by the competi- "tor that would take away that liberty. But "we have to do with an enemy at preſent that "neither kills us, nor fights with us, for the "quarrel is over. Now he is as faint-heart- "ed a wretch that preſſes to die when he "ſhould not, as he that is afraid to die, when "his honour calls him to it. And pray what "is it at laſt but the fear of death that keeps "us from going to the Romans? and ſhall we "caſt ourſelves into a certain death one way, "for fear of an uncertain death another? But "it is, you'll ſay perhaps, to avoid ſlavery: "and do you reckon yourſelves now to be at "liberty? But it is look'd upon as the part of "a brave man to take away his own life with "his own hand: and what would you think "of the maſter of a veſſel now, that for fear "of a ſtorm a coming, ſhould ſink his ſhip be- "fore it comes? would you account that man "a brave captain? to ſay nothing of the af- "front that is offer'd to the common inſtinct "of providence in the nature of things; for "the deſire of ſelf-preſervation is a principle "implanted in all living creatures; and for "any thing to deſtroy itſelf, is contrary to na- "ture, and conſequently a ſacrilegious wick- "edneſs againſt God himſelf. There is no "creature that ſeeks or covets its own death, "in oppoſition to the univerſal impulſe of a "deſire to live: and therefore we pronounce "thoſe people our enemies, that would take "away our lives, and puniſh thoſe that lie in "wait to deſtroy us. It is from God that "we have receiv'd life, and it is to him again "in his good time, that we are to render it: "and what can be more provoking and un- "grateful now, than the deſpiſing of his gifts? "Our bodies are all mortal, and ſo are the "materials of which they are compounded: "but the ſoul is a divine particle, infuſed in- "to the fleſh by God himſelf, and it can never "die. If any man ſhall imbezzle or abuſe a "depoſitum betwixt man and man, we can ſay "nothing bad enough of him: now the ſoul "is effectually but God's depoſitum: and ſhall

Againſt ſelf-murder.

" we preſume to rob the divine majeſty, and " think to come off at laſt without either diſ- " covery or puniſhment? We find it reaſona- " ble enough to puniſh run-away ſervants, " though it be from the worſt of maſters: and " ſhall we at the ſame time, that forſake a " gracious and a righteous God, pretend to " juſtify ourſelves? As for thoſe that govern " themſelves according to the inſtinct of na- " ture, and pay the debt of life back again to " him that gave it, whenever he commands " it; do not you know that everlaſting ho- " nours attend the memory of thoſe bleſſed " ſouls from generation to generation; which, " after a certain number of ages in the heaven- " ly manſions provided for them, ſhall return " and animate bodies, pure like themſelves? " whereas the deepeſt pit of hell is reſerv'd for " ſelf-murderers; and God will revenge the " iniquities of the fathers upon the children in " after ages. They are hateful to God, and " the wiſdom of our great law-giver hath been " ſo ſevere upon them, that the ſelf-murderer " is not allow'd burial till after ſun-ſet; though " a privilege never deny'd to an enemy. A- " mongſt the people of other nations, the " right hands of them who kill themſelves are " cut off from the bodies of the dead, as arm'd " againſt themſelves: for it was reaſonable " that the hand that parted the ſoul and the " body, ſhould be divided from the body it- " ſelf. It is a great bleſſing, my good friends, " to make a right judgment of things, and not " to render our condition worſe than it is, by " blaſpheming and incenſing our maker. If " we have a mind to live, what hinders us; " for life can be no diſhonour to us, where " we have given ſo many ſignal proofs of our " virtue? But if nothing will ſerve us but " dying, let us fall by the hands of thoſe that " have conquered. I am not for going over " to the enemy in ſuch a manner, as to fool " myſelf out of my life, by doing the ſame " thing to my deſtruction, that a deſerter does " to ſave himſelf. If the Romans ſhould be " treacherous and break faith with us, it would " be no more in ſome reſpects, than what a " body might honeſtly wiſh for; as it yields " matter for a ſteddy and a generous mind to " work upon; not only in the ſufferance, but " in the contempt of death: for the very baſe- " neſs of the perfidy will be ſome ſort of com- " fort to us, when we conſider, that the au- " thors of our ruin have made themſelves in- " famous and odious to eternity."

The Jews not to be re-claim'd

JOSEPH was in hope by this, and a great deal more that he ſaid to this purpoſe, to have diverted his companions from the impi- ous reſolution of deſtroying themſelves: but he found them deaf to all ſober counſels, as men abſolutely devoted to deſtruction; and in ſuch a tranſport of rage, that they preſs'd upon him with their ſwords drawn one after another, and with menacing words and actions, accompany'd with the vileſt reproaches in nature. In this ex- tremity, Joſeph behav'd with all the skill and addreſs imaginable, treating them one while in the ſtile and character of his commiſſion; (as authority carries a kind of reverence along with it) arguing with one man by his name, taking another by the hand, ſoliciting a third, reaſoning with another: ſo that in the concluſion, by this prudent application to the diſ- tracted variety of humours, he diverted the blow. It was much with him, in fine, as it is with a wild beaſt in the middle of a troop of huntſmen, that turns his head ſtill to him that is next. This did not hinder yet but that, when it came to the point of execution, ſeve- ral of the mutineers hearts fail'd them: and the veneration they had for their general made them drop their ſwords, even in the depth of his diſtreſs.

BUT Joſeph acted all this while, like a wiſe, as well as a good man; and caſting him- ſelf upon the providence of the Almighty, he determin'd at laſt to put his life to the hazard. " Well! ſays he, ſince death is the thing you " are reſolv'd upon, what have we more to " do now, than to caſt lots one after another " for our lives? and he ſtill upon whom " the lot falls to be kill'd by the next man; " and ſo every man to take his fortune round " after this method. This will prevent the " ſelf-murder; for it would be unreaſonable, " when part of us are dead, that any of the " reſt ſhould repent and eſcape." They were all pleas'd with the equity of the expedient: and ſo according to the propoſal they caſt lots; and the perſons upon whom they fell, were ſucceſſively put to death by the next men: not doubting but it would come to the general's turn at laſt, and pleaſing themſelves with the hope of dying in his company; which they valued more than life itſelf.

They draw lots for their lives.

IT came to this at laſt (whether by fortune or by providence) that there was only Joſeph, and one more, remaining of the whole number. Hereupon Joſeph enter'd into this deliberation. " If we caſt lots once again, ſays he, " either my friend muſt kill me, or I muſt kill " him, and dip my hand in the blood of my " countryman." So that Joſeph, in this diſ- ficulty, prevail'd with his companion to ſubmit to live, upon his engagement for his ſecurity.

Joſeph and one more ſubmit to live.

WHEN Joſeph was now deliver'd out of all his troubles, as well from the Romans as from his own people, he gave himſelf up to Nica- nor; who conducted him to Veſpaſian. There was a prodigious multitude of people aſſem- bled together, who preſs'd to ſee him; and a ſtrange confuſion of humours. Some were o- verjoy'd that he was taken; others threatening him: ſome crowding to get nearer him; and others, at a diſtance, crying out for juſtice up- on him as a publick enemy. They that were gotten near enough to obſerve the perſon of the man, and at the ſame time reflecting upon the wonderful things he had done, and the ſtate of his preſent condition, were in amazement at the change. But, after all this, there was not any one of the generals, how much ſoever pre- poſſeſs'd againſt him before, but, upon the very ſight of him, relented: Titus eſpecially; who was a perſon, above all the reſt, that had the greateſt eſteem for Joſeph's character and perſon, and the inſuperable dignity of his mind in the worſt of accidents; comparing alſo what he remember'd of him in the war, with what he ſaw of him now in the hands of his ene- mies, he could not but make his obſervation upon the power of fortune, the variable chance of war, and the uncertainty of human affairs. Theſe were Titus's thoughts of Joſeph: and he brought over all that heard him to be of the ſame opinion; not excepting his own father, with whom he was very inſtrumental towards Joſeph's preſervation.

Joſeph ſet at liberty, and conducted by Nicanor to Veſpaſian. All the diſ- courſe is of Joſeph Titus hath a high eſteem for Joſeph.

VESPASIAN

Joseph kept a close prisoner.

VESPASIAN commanded Joseph to be kept in close custody, as if he intended to send him to Nero; who thereupon desired private conference with him. Vespasian, upon this intimation, ordered all out of the room but himself, Titus, and two friends, and then gave him his audience; Joseph delivering himself in terms to this effect. "Sir, says he, you have "now in your hand Joseph, a prisoner; and "your present thought perhaps looks no far- "ther: but I am here a messenger sent by God "himself, about a matter that much more "concerns you: and if it had not been for "this commission, I could not have been here "at present, contrary to the duty of a Jewish "general, alive, in the hand of an enemy. "But what am I to be sent to Nero for, when "Vespasian himself is so near the empire, that "I can hardly distinguish betwixt Vespasian "and the emperor, or Cesar? beside that his "son Titus is to succeed him. Keep me as "close as you please, provided I may be Ves- "pasian's prisoner; who is not only my ma- "ster, but in effect the lord of the universe. "This is the truth of what I have in charge to "deliver: and whenever I shall be found so "sacrilegious an impostor, as to make use of "God's name to a lye, make an example of "me.

Vespasian speaks with Joseph in private.

Joseph foretels the succession of Vespasian and Titus to the empire.

THIS discourse of Joseph's look'd so like an invention to save himself, that Vespasian did not seem to give much heed to it at first; till upon laying together certain impulses that he had himself, with other tokens and predictions that seem'd to favour what Joseph had prophesy'd; and then comparing this story with Joseph's exactness in other cases, he came by degrees to give entire credit to the presage. Upon which, a friend and confident of Vespasian's (one of the two above-mention'd in presence) expostulated with Joseph about the credibility of what he had declar'd. "If you "are so good at divining, says he, how came "you to know nothing of the destruction of "Jotapata, and of your own imprisonment; "which would have sav'd you a great deal of "trouble? Well! says Joseph, I foretold the "inhabitants very particularly what was to "befal the town and myself; that the "former was to be destroy'd upon the forty "seventh day, and that I myself was to be taken "prisoner by the Romans." Vespasian caused a strict enquiry to be made in private, of the truth of this relation; which he found verify'd by the prisoners; and so came to have a better opinion of the rest. But Joseph was not at all eas'd yet in the strictness of his restraint; but, to all other purposes of accommodation and convenience, treated with great courtesy and respect, by Titus in a more peculiar manner.

Vespasian gives little heed to it.

The truth of Joseph's predictions confirmed.

ON the fourth of the month * Panemus, Vespasian return'd to Ptolemais, and thence went to Cesarea on the sea-coast; which is the fairest city of Judea. The greater part of the inhabitants were Greeks: so that Vespasian and his army were welcome upon a double account; partly out of the love they had for the Romans, and partly out of the aversion they had for the Jews. The latter were so violent, that they press'd Vespasian with clamorous importunities to put Joseph to death. The general consider'd this tumultuary address, only as the act of a rash multitude; and so dismiss'd the petitioners without an answer. He look'd upon it as a commodious winter-quarter, and so lodg'd two legions in it; sending the tenth and the fifth legions to Scythopolis, out of a tenderness not to overcharge Cesarea. This town is situate upon a plain near the sea, extremely hot in the summer, and temperate in the winter.

Vespasian returns to Ptolemais, and so to Cesarea.

Joppe a den of thieves and mutineers. Vespasian takes the town by surprize. The inhabitants put themselves aboard their shipping. The description of Joppe. A furious storm. Joppe taken the second time by the Romans. The castle fortify'd and garison'd. Not a man left alive upon the place. Joseph said to be slain, and universally lamented: but when they found him living, and in credit with the Romans, he was as much envy'd and detested, as he was before esteem'd.

Joppe a nest of rovers and and mutineers.

THERE was now a prodigious multitude of people got together, part of them revolters from the Romans, and part fugitives out of some conquer'd cities of the Jews. This rabble fell to work upon the rebuilding of Joppe, which Cestius had demolish'd; and for want of subsistence in the country, which he had laid waste, they resolv'd to try their fortunes at sea, and put out with a fleet of privateers; scouring Syria, Phenicia, and the coasts of Egypt; pillaging all traders in those seas, and wholly obstructing the commerce. Vespasian, being well inform'd what they were a doing, sent a body of horse and foot to Joppe; which being loosely guarded, they enter'd the town in the night with much ease. The inhabitants were so disorder'd upon this surprize, that, without daring to attempt any thing upon the Romans, they went all aboard in a hurry, and lay that night off at sea, somewhat more than a bow-shot from the town.

Vespasian takes the town by surprize.

The inhabitants put themselves aboard their shipping.

AS to the description of the place, it is a sea-town without any manner of port; the shore steep and craggy, with two pointed rocks, one on each side, stretching out a good way into the sea, and a little bending, in the form of a half-moon; which makes a very tempestuous sea there in foul weather. Here are the marks still to be seen of Andromeda's chains, for the credit of the old fable. A cross wind upon that quarter dashes the waves and the rocks together in so dreadful a manner, that nothing can be more hideous or dangerous.

The description of Joppe

A furious storm.

WHILE the men of Joppe were riding in this station, there arose a furious storm by break of day; which is known to the people of the place by the name of the Black-north. This wind batter'd their vessels to pieces; some against one another, others against the rocks: and then there were great numbers of them, that, labouring against the tide to put to sea, were over-turn'd and swallow'd up. So that their choice was certain death, either to fly or ſtay: the one for the rocks, the other for the enemy. This was their condition, betwixt the winds at ſea, and the Romans a-ſhore. The ſhrieks and outcries of the people, and the clattering of the veſſels, was a moſt diſmal hearing: but upon the whole, ſome were drown'd; others dy'd a-board the wrecks: ſome fell upon their ſwords, as if it had been to prevent the ſea; ſeveral were waſh'd away by the billows, and beaten to pieces againſt the rocks; till the water was diſcolour'd with the blood, and the whole coaſt cover'd with dead bodies: the ſoldiers waiting all this while upon the land, to diſpatch thoſe that were driven a-ſhore. They reckon'd, in fine, upon four thouſand two hundred bodies caſt up with the tide.

Joppe taken the ſecond time by the Romans. The caſtle fortify'd and garriſon'd.

THE Romans being now maſters of Joppe, without being at the expence of a battle, they ras'd it to the ground: and this was the ſecond time of their taking it in a very ſhort time. But Veſpaſian, for fear it might come to be a neſt of pirates yet once again, fortify'd the caſtle, and put into it a foot-gariſon ſufficient to maintain it; leaving there alſo a conſiderable body of horſe, to ſcour, burn, and lay waſte all the towns, villages, and country thereabouts; which orders day after day were executed accordingly.

WHEN the news of Jotapata's being taken came to Jeruſalem, the ſtory was ſo extraordinary, and the fact ſo ill atteſted, that little or no credit was given to it. Now there was not, in truth, ſo much as one man of the place left alive to carry the tidings: but the fame of it ſpread among the neighbourhood, as ill news commonly flys ſwiftly. But how doubtful ſoever it might ſeem at firſt, it came by little and little to paſs for current; and to ſuch a degree of credit, that people believ'd more than all, and ſwallow'd the whole truth with additions. For it was confidently given out, that, upon the taking of the city, Joſeph was ſlain, to the infinite affliction of Jeruſalem, and of all that was conſiderable in that city. Some were lamented by particular families; others by friends, relations, or their own people: but the general, being a publick loſs, was the ſubject of an univerſal mourning: inſomuch, that for thirty days there was no intermiſſion of ſorrow, and no coſt ſpar'd for the celebration of the funeral ceremony and pomp. But when time brought truth to light, and gave the world the hiſtory of Jotapata juſt as it was in fact: that is to ſay, when it came to be known that Joſeph was not dead as reported, but yet living, and in ſo great credit with the Romans, that their generals, inſtead of treating him as a ſlave, crown'd him with all the honours they could confer upon him; the veneration they had for him, while they look'd upon him to be dead, was now turn'd into the moſt virulent envy and hatred. How many cowards and traytors did they call him for abandoning the cauſe! And how did the whole city join with his detractors in the calumny and reproach! It is the part and practice of wiſe men to make uſe of one misfortune for a precaution againſt another, and to keep themſelves upon their guard: but theſe people, on the contrary, when they are once out of their way, purſue their error, and make the end of one miſchief the beginning of another. At this rate the Jews were now tranſported into a greater rage againſt the Romans than ever; as if the wreaking of their malice upon them, were the neareſt way to their revenge upon Joſeph. Theſe were the troubles of Jeruſalem at this time.

Joſeph ſaid to be ſlain, and univerſally lamented.

Joſeph as much hated, when they found him living, and in credit with the Romans.

Aggrippa treats Veſpaſian and his army twenty days at Ceſarea Philippi. News of Tiberias and Tarichee, that the one is wavering, and the other revolted. Veſpaſian orders ſome troops to Scythopolis, and encamps at Ennabris, within ſight of the rebels. The general gives Valerian his inſtructions, to ſpeak them fair. The faction falls upon Valerian by ſurprize. Veſpaſian at the inſtance of Agrippa, pardons the affront. Trajan takes poſſeſſion of the caſtle. Veſpaſian marches up to the city, and is receiv'd with acclamations.

KING Agrippa having invited Veſpaſian to paſs away a little time with him in his country, and to bring his army along with him, partly out of generoſity and kindneſs, and partly in hope by his means to bring ſome mutinous malecontents into better order, the general embraced the motion with great reſpect, and marched from Ceſarea upon the ſea coaſt to Ceſarea Philippi; where he ſtaid twenty days, refreſhing himſelf and his troops, and giving God thanks with feaſting and rejoycing for the bleſſings of his ſucceſſes. Veſpaſian was there given to underſtand, that Tiberias was at that time wavering, and Tarichee already revolted; both places being dependencies upon the kingdom of Agrippa, he thought he could not have a fairer opportunity of acknowledging his obligations to Agrippa, than by reducing thoſe people to their allegiance, eſpecially being reſolved within himſelf to preſs hard upon the Jews. So he ſent away his ſon Titus for the troops that were quarter'd, at Ceſarea, to bring them to Scythopolis; a place not far from Tiberias, and much the largeſt town in the canton of Decapolis. Veſpaſian got thither firſt, and there ſtaid for his ſon: advancing afterwards with three legions within thirty * furlongs of Tiberias, and there encamped at a place call'd † Ennabris, within ſight of the rebels. From thence he order'd out Valerian, a captain, with fifty horſe, to try what might be done with fair words towards the bringing of them to their duty. His inſtructions were to tell them, that the general took the people to be peaceably enough inclin'd, if it were not for ſome ſeditious incendiaries that were among them. When Valerian was come up almoſt to the town, he alighted from his horſe, and commanded his companions to do the like, that there might be no colour of any jealouſy of an ill intention. The faction, under the command of Jeſus the ſon of Tobias, a captain of a band of robbers, fell furiouſly upon Valerian and his people, without giving them time ſo much as to ſpeak one word. Valerian was not a little ſurprized at the affront; but durſt not however engage with them, contrary to his general's order; even tho' he had been ſure to have got the better of them: beſide, that there was no venturing a battle upon that odds. Valerian, in fine, and five of his men, made their eſcapes a-foot, being forced to leave their horſes behind them; which Jeſus and his crew carry'd off in triumph into the town, as the trophies of a victory rather than a ſcandalous booty.

THE mean and unmanly coarſeneſs of this action put the ſenſible and the ſober men of the town into ſuch an apprehenſion for fear of a revenge, that they went preſently out to the Roman camp, under the countenance and conduct of king Agrippa, and caſt themſelves at Veſpaſian's feet for mercy and pardon; begging of him not to impute the crimes of particular perſons to the whole body of a people, that never wanted veneration for the Romans; and likewiſe to ſpare the innocent, and puniſh the authors and promoters of the defection. Veſpaſian could hardly forgive the town the ſeizure of the horſes; but however, for Agrippa's ſake, and upon his mediation, he granted their requeſt. So ſoon as Veſpaſian had pardon'd them, Jeſus and his crew did not think it requiſite to continue any longer at Tiberias; and ſo they mov'd off to Tarichee.

Veſpaſian, at the inſtance of Agrippa, pardons the affront.

VESPASIAN ſent Trajan the day following with a party of horſe, to take poſſeſſion of the caſtle, and to ſound the common people if they were of the ſame peaceable diſpoſition with their deputies. Upon finding that they were well diſpos'd, Veſpaſian march'd up to the city with his whole army; the citizens opening their gates to bid him welcome, and receiving him upon the way with gratulations and acknowledgments, as their benefactor and protector. But the gates being too narrow for the troops to march at liberty, Veſpaſian cauſed a part of the ſouth-wall to be beaten down, to widen the paſſage; but with a command, upon the uttermoſt penalty, not to offer any ſort of violence to the people whatſoever. This was for Agrippa's ſake, he ſaid; and ſo it was alſo, that he ſpar'd the remainder of the wall, upon the king's undertaking for the people's good behaviour for the time to come. This was the end, for the preſent, of the troubles of Tiberias.

Trajan takes poſſeſſion of the caſtle. Veſpaſian marches up to the city, and is receiv'd with acclamations.

Veſpaſian encamps betwixt Tiberias and Tarichee. Tarichee a nurſery of ſeditious people. The ſtrength and ſituation of the place. The faction breaks in upon the Roman pioneers. The Romans purſue the Jews up to their ſhipping. A vaſt number of Jews in a body; and Titus ſent out for diſcovery. Titus's ſpeech to his ſoldiers. The utter deſtruction of the Jews. A violent faction in the city: Titus within hearing of it, makes advantage of the occaſion. Titus enters the town by the lake, and carries all before him. Titus ſends his father an account of the action, and orders the building of ſhips to look after the fugitives.

Veſpaſian encamps betwixt Tiberias and Tarichee.

VESPASIAN was now gone from Tiberias, and encamped betwixt that and Tarichee; where he fortify'd his camp with a wall, reputing with himſelf that the taking of that place would be a work of time. For it was wonderfully ſtrong both by art and nature; and beſide, that it was fortify'd by the lake of Genezareth, it was look'd upon as the receptacle of all the deſperate turbulent people of the faction. It ſtands like Tiberias, upon a mountain; and Joſeph had run up a ſtrong wall round about it, ſave only on the lake ſide: but ſomewhat leſs than that of Tiberias. At the beginning of the revolt, there wanted neither men, monies, nor proviſions for the making of it impregnable: and there was over and above to ſpare alſo, for Tarichee. The beſiegers had likewiſe a fleet of armed boats in readineſs upon the lake, for a retreat, in caſe of a blow at land, or to ſerve for a naval fight, if there ſhould be occaſion.

Tarichee a nurſery of ſeditious people. The ſtrength and ſituation of the place.

WHILE the Romans were fortifying and intrenching, Jeſus and his fellows made a furious attack upon them; ſcatter'd the pioneers, and overthrew a good part of their works, without any dread either of the Roman diſcipline, or their numbers. But upon the Romans advancing toward them in a groſs body, they got off ſafe to their party without any damage; the Romans purſuing them to the lake, where they caſt themſelves a-board their veſſels; and when they were gotten out of the reach of the Roman darts and arrows, they came to an anchor; and there they lay ranged in as good order of battle againſt their enemies a-ſhore, as if they had been drawn up in form for a combat.

The faction breaks in upon the Roman pioneers.

The Romans purſuing the Jews up to their ſhipping.

WHILE this was a doing, Veſpaſian had an account brought him of a great body of Jews gather'd together on the next plain; and thereupon ſent out his ſon with a detachment of ſix hundred choice horſe for diſcovery. Titus march'd, and finding himſelf ſo mightily overnumber'd, ſent an expreſs to his father that he had occaſion for an enforcement. This vaſt multitude ſtagger'd ſeveral of the party; but Titus finding the greater part of his men chearful and hearty, in deſpite of all inequality and diſproportion, he took up a ſtanding where he might beſt be heard, and ſpoke to his ſoldiers after this manner:

A vaſt number of Jews in a body, and Titus ſent out for diſcovery.

Titus to his ſoldiers.

" ROMANS, ſays he, for I cannot begin " my diſcourſe more auſpiciouſly than by put- " ting you in mind of your race, and by tel- " ling you whence and what you are, and " whom you have to do withal. As to the " Romans, the whole world allows them to be " invincible upon undeniable proof and expe- " rience: and I have this to ſay for the Jews " too, that though they have been often van- " quiſhed, they would never own themſelves " to be overcome; ſo that we have no more " to do, than to ſtand as firm at leaſt in our " proſperity as they do in their adverſity. I " read chearfulneſs and courage in the very " faces of you, and it joys me to ſee it: but " yet I am uneaſy ſometimes, for fear the vaſt " numbers of your enemies ſhould ſtrike a ſe- " cret damp into that reſolution. Wherefore " let every man duly conſider his own force, " and that of his adverſary. The Jews, 'tis " true, are generally bold, and fearleſs of " death; but utterly unacquainted with mili- " tary conduct and diſcipline, and may be more " properly called a confus'd rout than an ar- " my: whereas nothing can be more regular, " or inſtructive, than our order and experience. " What are we the better for the practice of " arms in time of peace, if it does not help us " to ſupply the want of numbers, by ſkill and " addreſs? Or, what's the benefit of a perpe- " tual exerciſe of war, if it gives us no advan- " tage over men that are raw and unexpe- " rienc'd? Do but conſider what it is to en- " gage naked men with men in arms, foot with " horſe; men that underſtand nothing of go- " vernment, with eminent commanders; and " that we are as good as double the number " we appear to be, at that rate of advantage, " and the enemy not half ſo ſtrong as we take " them for. It is not number alone that does " the buſineſs in war, let the combatants be " never ſo ſtout; but true courage, as we ſee " every day, does wonders with a few: for " moderate numbers are manageable to the " beſt advantage of the party; but great bo- " dies are liable to diſorder and confuſion, " and more miſchievous to themſelves many " times than an enemy. The daring, deſpe- " rate, and brutal fierceneſs of the Jews does " a great deal; I muſt confeſs, in a proſperous " courſe of fortune; but, upon the leaſt check " of a diſaſter or diſappointment, that impe- " tuous ardour abates and comes to nothing: " whereas virtue, reſignation, obedience, and " true valour, will ſupport us in all our for- " tunes good or bad, without ever puffing us " up, or deceiving us. Beſide that we have " a greater intereſt at ſtake than the Jews; for " theirs is only a popular quarrel, for liberty, " and their country; but we contend for glo- " ry, and for the fame of an immortal memo- " ry; and not without ſome indignation nei- " ther, after the conqueſt of the whole world " beſide, to find ourſelves hamper'd in a com- " petition with the Jews. You may obſerve " again, even in caſe of the worſt, that we " ſhall run no great risk neither in the conteſt; " being ſure to be well ſeconded with ſo ma- " ny of our allies, ſo ſtrong, and ſo near us. " But what have we more to do now than to " anticipate the victory, and ingroſs the honour " of it to ourſelves, without waiting for the " enforcement we expect from my father? " the glory will be the greater when it comes " home to us entire, without ſharing. The " point at preſent in queſtion is no leſs than the " character of my father, myſelf, and my fel- " low-ſoldiers; that is to ſay, whether or no " my father deſerves the honour the world has " done him. And am not I his ſon then, and " are not you my ſoldiers? My father hath " been ſo wonted to victory, that I ſhould " never dare to look him in the face again af- " ter I had been once vanquiſhed; and would " not you be as much aſham'd of a repulſe on " the other hand, where the general leads the " way? The firſt poſt of danger ſhall be mine; " do but you ſtand by me, and commit the reſt " to God's providence: only remember what " I tell you, that a cloſe fight will be moſtly " to our advantage."

The utter deſtruction of the Jews

THE ſoldiers were ſo elevated, and ſo he- roically diſpos'd upon this diſcourſe, that it look'd as if they had been inſpir'd with quite another ſoul. Only Trajan's coming up with four hundred horſe before the battle, put them a little out of humour, to think of having partners in the glory of the day. Veſpaſian at the ſame time ſent Antonius Silo, with two thouſand archers, to take poſſeſſion of a moun- tain over againſt the town, and to beat the de- fendants from the wall; which was perform'd accordingly. Titus, having a mind to be thought ſtronger than he was, drew up his ar- my in a line to anſwer the front of the enemy; and was the firſt man himſelf that charg'd in up- on their body; his men following him with ex- ultations and outcries. The Jews were not a little ſurpriz'd at the boldneſs and manner of this attack; yet for ſome inconſiderable time ſuſtain'd the fury of it, till they were beaten down, and trampled upon by the horſe; and ſo diſpers'd, ſhifting away into the city the beſt they could, a great many being kill'd up- on the place. Titus all this while preſſing up- on the backs of ſome of them, croſſing upon others, and cutting them over their faces, overtaking ſome, and forcing others back again that made for the walls, and tumbling them one over another; inſomuch that few or none eſcap'd, but thoſe that got into the town.

A violent faction in the city.

THERE happen'd at this time a terrible fac- tion in the city, betwixt the natives and the ſtrangers: the former were uneaſy both for their own ſakes and for the city's. They were ever againſt the war, they ſaid, but yet their greateſt quarrel was the ill ſucceſs. But the ſtrangers, that were very violent and numerous, broke out into clamours and outrages, as if they were already at daggers-drawing. They were ſo loud in the city, and Titus ſo near the wall, that he was within hearing of them; and up- on that occaſion, call'd out to his men: " The " time is come, my fellow ſoldiers, ſays he, " if we have but the hearts to make uſe of it; " for God hath deliver'd up the Jews into " our hands, and we may have a victory for the " taking of it up. Do you not hear what diſ- " cord and contention is among the very men " that have eſcap'd our hands? the city is our " own, if we do not ſlip the opportunity. But " this is a buſineſs that requires reſolution as " well as diſpatch; and great things are not " to be done without hazard. Why do we " not take the advantage of this mortal ani- " moſity, and fall upon them before their ne- " ceſſities force them to unite? and why do " we not fall upon them too, before our aux- " iliaries come up, to rob us, not only of the " credit, but of the profit alſo of the action? " for, beſide the reputation of ſo gallant an ex- " ploit with ſuch a handful of men, we ſhall " have both the credit and the ſpoil to our- " ſelves."

Titus within hearing of it, and improves the occaſion.

WITH theſe words he mounted his horſe, and gallop'd away to the lake; where he was the firſt man that enter'd the town, and his troops follow'd him. The defendants were ſtruck with ſuch an aſtoniſhment at the bold- neſs of this enterprize, that not a man had the heart either to oppoſe his perſon, or to obſtruct his paſſage. Jeſus and his companions made away into the fields; ſome fled toward the lake, and fell into the very mouths of the Ro- mans; others endeavour'd to ſave themſelves by their boats, but were cut off by the way: others again, by ſwimming, but ſunk in the attempt; and the ſlaughter was yet more ter- rible in the town. The ſtrangers that could not get off with Jeſus, made ſome reſiſtance; but the natives none at all; in hope that the Romans would conſider them as only paſſive in the caſe, and force'd into the war contrary to their judgment and inclination.

Titus enters the town by the lake, and carries all be- fore him.

So ſoon as Titus had maſter'd and deſtroy'd the the faction, he gave quarter to the natives. The town being now taken, thoſe upon the lake withdrew as far from the enemy as they could; and Titus immediately ſent a party of horſe expreſs to his father, with the welcome tidings of this glorious exploit: for the main difficulty of the war was look'd upon to be now over in the reducing of this city. The next thing Titus did, was the appointing of a ſtrict guard round about the city, and ſetting a watch upon all the avenues to prevent eſcapes. The day following he went to the lake, and order'd veſſels to be built, and ſent out in purſuit of thoſe who had got off that way. Theſe boats were quickly made ready; for they had workmen and materials in abundance at hand.

Titus ſends his father notice of the exploit.

And orders veſſels to be built to look after the fugitives.

The quality and deſcription of the lake of Genezareth. The river Jordan, with the head and courſe of it. Genezareth famous for fruits and plants. The fountain of Capernaum.

The quality and deſcription of the lake Genezareth.

THE lake of Genezareth is ſo called from the country about it. The breadth of it is forty * furlongs; the length an † hundred; the water is ſweet and potable, much clearer than ſen-waters generally are, and vaſtly preferable both in taſte and colour. It lies upon a gravel, and ſo more conveniently to be drawn, and gentler than either a river ot a fountain water. And with all this it is ſo cold, that the people of the place cannot warm it by ſetting it in the ſun in the hotteſt ſeaſon of the year. It hath in it great variety of fiſh; which, for taſte and ſhape, are not to be found any where elſe; and the river Jordan runs thro' the middle of it. The ‡ head of this river has been thought to be Panion; but, in truth, it paſſes hither under ground; and the ſource of it is Phiala, an hundred  and twenty furlongs from Ceſarea, a little on the right hand, and not much out of the way to Trachonis. It is called Phiala, from the round figure of it; and the water in it ſtands always at a ſtay; the baſon brimful, without either ſhrinking or overflowing. The firſt diſcovery of this ſecret was from Philip the tetrarch of Trachonis, by caſting ſtraws into Phiala, that came out again at Panion, which till that time was taken for the head of the Jordan. This Panion is naturally lovely by ſituation, but moſt magnificently beautify'd and enrich'd by the royal bounty of Agrippa. This river, in fine, that ſeems to take its original from this receſs, croſſes the bogs and fens of the lake Semechonitis: and, after a courſe of an hundred and twenty furlongs farther, paſſes under the city of Julias, and ſo over the lake of Genezareth a great way into the deſart, till it diſembogues itſelf into the lake of Aſphaltitis.

The river Jordan, with the head and courſe of it.

THIS lake takes the name of Genezareth from the country that ſurrounds it; which is fruitful and agreeable to admiration. As to the fertility of the ſoil, there is no plant comes amiſs to it; beſide that it is improv'd by the skill and induſtry of the inhabitants to the higheſt degree, and by a ſtrange felicity of the climate, every thing proſpers there; as nuts, palms, figs and olive-trees, that flouriſh here in perfection, though they require a quite different temperature of air in the nature of them; which looks as if providence took delight in this place to reconcile contradictions; and as if the very ſeaſons themſelves were in a competition which ſhould be moſt obliging. And the production of ſtrange varieties of excellent fruit is not all neither, but the conſerving of them ſo long quick and ſound is another curioſity. Figs and grapes hold in ſeaſon there ten months in the year, and other fruits the whole year about. And the place is not more famous for a delicious air, than it is for a cryſtalline flowing fountain, called by the natives Capernaum. Some take it for a little gut of the Nile, becauſe of a certain *† fiſh in it, that is no where elſe to be found but in Alexandria. The length of the country along the lake is thirty †† furlongs, and the breadth twenty. Let this ſuffice for a deſcription of the place.

Veſpaſian encounters the enemy upon the lake. The miſerable ſtate of the Jews. Veſpaſian calls a great council, where ſentence is paſs'd upon the priſoners.

Veſpaſian encounters the enemy upon the lake.

WHEN Veſpaſian's boats were all ready, he went aboard himſelf, and took as many men along with him, as he thought ſufficient to deal with the fugitives that had ſhifted away to the lake: ſo that there was no poſſibility of their eſcaping; for the whole country a-ſhore was their enemy, and they were in no condition upon the water for a ſea-fight: their boats being rather for piracy than combat, and neither of a ſize nor of a ſtrength to come to a ſhock with the Romans: beſide that they were better mann'd, and in better order. All they could do was by inſults, ſometimes at a diſtance, and ſometimes near at hand; one while pelting them with ſtones, another while provoking them to handy ſtrokes: while they themſelves were the greateſt ſufferers both ways ſtill; for the Romans being well arm'd, the ſtones made only a noiſe and a clatter where they fell, without doing any execution; while the other lay open and expos'd to the Roman arrows: or, if they attempted any thing nearer hand, they were cut off before they could effect it; their boats overturn'd, and their men drowned. The enemy diſpatch'd ſome of them at a diſtance with their darts; others they boarded, and deſtroy'd with their ſwords: ſome again were hemm'd in, and taken, veſſels and all, as they were lock'd up betwixt the two fleets. As for thoſe that were tumbled over-board, and dabbling for life, they could no ſooner ſhew their heads above water, but they were immediately taken off by a lance, or over-run by the enemies boats and ſunk: or if any of them in the rage of their deſpairs did but make toward their adverſaries verſaries, they were ſure to have their hands or their heads chopp'd off. There was nothing, in fine, to be ſeen, but death and deſtruction in all the varieties of horror, till they were totally broken and routed, preſſing through the middle of their enemies to get a-ſhore. In this confuſion, there were abundance of them kill'd upon the water, great numbers more at land; and nothing to be ſeen upon the lake, or the borders of it, but blood and carcaſſes; for not a man eſcap'd. Theſe putrid bodies in a few days tainted the air, to ſuch a degree of malignancy, that the caſe was not only dreadful to the ſufferers of the calamity, but offenſive to the very actors themſelves. This was the iſſue of the naval battle, and the whole number of the ſlain in both actions, (that in the city, and this upon the lake) amounted to ſix thouſand and five hundred perſons.

WHEN the fight was over, Veſpaſian took his place upon the tribunal; and ſeparating the ſtrangers that were the cauſe of the war from the natives, who were only paſſive in it, he call'd a great council of his officers about him, to conſider what was to be done with theſe people, and whether or no they were to be treated all alike. The council was againſt the ſaving of the ſtrangers; for they would never be quiet, they ſaid, as they had no home to truſt to, and would be dangerous and troubleſome to any prince whatſoever that ſhould receive them. Veſpaſian was throughly ſatisfy'd that they deſerv'd to die, and that they would rebel againſt their preſervers; but the difficulty was, in what manner to get rid of them; for the inhabitants would lay it to heart to ſee ſo many people put to death, after a promiſe of quarter upon their mediation; beſide Veſpaſian's ſcruple, upon a point of honour and juſtice, of breaking faith with his priſoners. But his council inſiſted upon it, that he was not ty'd up to thoſe punctilio's with the Jews; and that where ſtrict honeſty and policy are inconſiſtent, the common good ought to have the preference. Veſpaſian was over-rul'd by his friends, and gave the ſtrangers leave to depart, upon condition they kept the way that led to Tiberias. People are apt to believe what they wiſh; and in this confidence they march'd for Tiberias, without the leaſt apprehenſion of any violence in their paſſage, either upon their perſons or goods. Now the Romans had ſo beſet the way that it was impoſſible for a ſoul to eſcape. When they had them in the town, they made them all priſoners; Veſpaſian cauſing them afterward to be ſhut up in the amphitheatre, where he order'd both old and young, to the number of twelve hundred, that were not able to bear arms, to be put to death; ſix thouſand of the ſtrongeſt body'd men among them to be ſent away to the Iſthmus to Nero. Thirty thouſand four hundred were ſold for ſlaves, beſide what Veſpaſian gave to Agrippa, whom he left at liberty to do what he would with, as being his own ſubjects; but the king ſold them too. The reſt were Trachonites, Gaulanites, Hippenians, and a great many Gadarites; moſt of them incendiaries and fugitives, and promoters of war, becauſe they could not live in peace. They were taken upon the eighth of the month * Gorpieus.

CHAP. I.

The ſiege of Gamala, and the manner of it; with the ſituation and ſtrength of the city. Veſpaſian advances up to the place. The Romans take Gamala by aſſault, and are beaten out of it again with a prodigious loſs. The generoſity of Veſpaſian, and his preſence of mind. A notable action of Gallus a centurion. A glorious ſpeech of Veſpaſian to his ſoldiers. A ſecond attempt upon Gamala.

THE towns and places in Galilee, that revolted from the Romans upon the taking of Jotapata, came back again to their duty, upon the loſs of Tarichee: ſo that the Romans were now maſters of all the cities and ſtrong holds, but Giſchala, and the mountain of * Itabyr. And there joined in the rebellion with theſe alſo, the city of Gamala, which ſtands upon the lake over againſt Tarichee, and belongs to the government of Agrippa. Sogane revolted likewiſe, and ſo did Seleucia, after their example: which were both of the province of Gaulanitis: Sogane in the upper part of it, which is called Gaulana, and Gamala in the lower. Seleucia ſtands upon the lake Semechonitis; which is ſixty † furlongs in length; and thirty over: and the fenny borders of it reach as far as Daphne. This is a delicious country in many reſpects; but more eſpecially for the curious ſprings in it, that feed the leſſer Jordan, (as they call it) and then take their courſe to the great Jordan, at the foot of Jupiter's golden temple. King Agrippa, at the beginning of this defection, enter'd into an alliance with the people of Sogane and Seleucia; but Gamala, depending upon its own ſtrength, as being a much tougher place, and more arduous of acceſs than Jotapata, refuſed to be of the party. This Gamala is erected upon the cliff of a rock, that riſes out of the middle of a high mountain; and in that poſture of elevation, with crags before and behind it, has ſome reſemblance of the figure of a camel; from whence originally it took its name: but time and cuſtom have corrupted the way of writing it. Upon the front, and the two ſides, are deep inacceſſible vallies. The part that joins the mountain is not of itſelf ſo difficult of acceſs; but as the inhabitants have fortify'd it with trenches and defences, it is next to impregnable. The houſes ſtand ſo thick, and ſhelving upon the ſteep of the hill to the ſouthward, that they look as if they were ready to drop into the precipice. And there is alſo a hill of ſo prodigious a height, that it may ſerve for a citadel to the valley in the bottom. And there was alſo a fountain within the circumference of this city, and there the town ended.

† Sixty furlongs amounted to ſeven Engliſh miles and an half, and ninety geometrical paces: thirty to three Engliſh miles and three quartars, and forty five geometrical paces, as has been before obſerved.

But ſtill, after all that nature had done toward the making of this place invincible, Joſeph was not yet ſatisfy'd without environing it with a wall, and caſting up artificial works, trenches and fortifications, for a farther ſecurity. The inhabitants were much more confident in the defenſible condition of the place, than the men of Jotapata; though neither ſo many, nor ſo good ſoldiers: but the difficulties of the attack made amends for the want of numbers: Not but that the city was well mann'd; for it was made the ſanctuary of all the refugees; inſomuch that king Agrippa ſpent ſeven months before it without any manner of advantage.

Vespasian advances up to the place

Vespasian at this time decamped from * Ammaus near Tiberias; ſo called from a hot fountain there, of a ſovereign virtue againſt ſeveral diſeaſes: and ſo came to Gamala, where he found it impoſſible to draw a regular line of circumvallation about it: but he ſet guards however upon all the paſſes he could come at, and poſſeſs'd himſelf of the mountain above. The Romans, according to their cuſtom, fortify'd their camp, carry'd up a wall about it, and ſo intrench'd. The fifteenth legion was poſted againſt a tower, eaſtward, upon the higheſt part of the town; the fifth, toward the middle of the town, and the tenth was appointed to level the ditches and other hollow places.

King Agrippa ſhot with a ſtone from a ſling

While things were in this poſture, king Agrippa drew cloſe up to the wall, to try if he could bring the people to ſurrender the place, and reaſon them into a ſenſe of their duty. But in this inſtant he receiv'd a terrible blow with a ſtone from a ſling, upon his right elbow; his friends thronging immediately about him to bring him off; and the Romans in a direct rage to conſider how barbarouſly theſe people would treat ſtrangers and enemies, that could be thus inhuman to their own prince, their country-man, and a friend that adviſ'd them for their good; this provok'd them to preſs the ſiege with all poſſible vigour.

Betwixt many hands, and diligent applications, the works were not long in raiſing: and the next thing to be done, was the mounting of their machines. Chares and Joſeph (two of the moſt conſiderable men in the town) had the ordering of the defence; and ſo led up the ſoldiers to the wall, with exhortations and encouragements to behave themſelves like men of honour. But wanting water and other neceſſaries, they had no great ſtomach to the action; for they found they could not hold it out long. Upon the advance of the Roman machines, they made ſome ſort of reſiſtance at firſt; but ſo ſoon as ever they came to throw their ſtones and their arrows among them, they retir'd with precipitation into the town.

The Romans take Gamala by aſſault

The Romans batter'd the wall with their rams upon three attacks; and upon diſputing a breach, what with the outcries without and within the town, the clang of the trumpets, and the clattering of arms, nothing could be more hideous. The defendants ſtood the firſt ſhock with great bravery, and put the Romans to a ſtand; but being overborne in the end by the force of numbers, they all fled, and betook themſelves to the higheſt parts of the city, with the Romans all this while at their backs. But the Jews, finding themſelves preſs'd, return'd upon their purſuers, drove them down precipices before them, and through difficult paſſages; where they did execution upon them at pleaſure. The Romans finding the diſadvantage of contending with enemies over their heads, and that there was no avoiding them as they lay puſhing at them from an upper ground, they caſt themſelves for ſanctuary into ſome of the enemy's houſes below; but they were ſo overcrouded with numbers, that they ſunk under the weight; ſo that the fall of one brought down another, and that, a third. There were a great many Romans that periſh'd under the ruins, and yet in this extremity they choſe rather to commit themſelves to the hazard of thoſe tottering houſes, than to lie open and expos'd for a publick mark. Some there were that were cruſh'd all to pieces with the timbers, others maim'd in attempting to eſcape; and ſome again that were ſuffocated with the duſt. At this rate there periſh'd great numbers of the Romans, ſome one way, ſome another. But the people were ſo far from being troubled at the loſs of their habitations, that they reckon'd themſelves gainers by the fall of ſo many of their enemies in exchange: and ſtill as one houſe fail'd, they preſs'd the Romans into another to bring down that too. As any of them loſt their foot-hold, they were ſure to be taken off with weapons from above; which the very walls and dead bodies furniſh'd them with in abundance: the one with ſtones, and the other with arrows: for the ſwords of thoſe that were kill'd, were made uſe of to diſpatch the reſt, and every thing contributed to the common fate. Some caſt themſelves down headlong from the tops of the houſes, to avoid being ſqueez'd to death in the fall of them. Others had a mind to fly, if they had but known how or whither: but being ſtrangers to the paſſages and ways, and blinded with the duſt in this confuſion, they fell foul one upon another. Some there were however that had the good fortune to eſcape, and get out of the town.

Veſpaſian's bravery and preſence of mind.

It was no ſmall mortification to Veſpaſian, to ſee his army thus broken by the ruins of a city that they had taken; ſo that without any regard to the ſafety of his own perſon (as it was his conſtant cuſtom to be foremoſt in all hazards) he poſted himſelf privately in a ſtation at the upper part of the town, where he was left with ſome few reſolute men about him, in the greateſt diſtreſs imaginable: his ſon Titus being abroad at this time in Syria, upon a commiſſion to Mutianus. His condition was ſuch, that it was neither ſafe nor honourable for him to turn his back. So that calling to mind the glorious hiſtory of his paſt actions, and reſolving to make his life all of a piece, he took this wiſe method for the obviating of the preſent difficulty; which look'd more like a divine inſpiration than a common council of fleſh and blood. That is to ſay, he planted himſelf with the few people he had, as cloſe one to another as they could croud together, and, covering themſelves with their arms, ſtood firm againſt all attempts of violence from above. The Jews were ſo ſtartled at this prodigious obſtinacy, that they look'd upon it as a providential impulſe; and in dread

of oppoſing a divine power, abated ſomewhat of the vigour of the action. Veſpaſian, taking notice that the fury of the enemy ſlacken'd, drew off by little and little, and never turn'd his back till he was got out of the walls.

A bloody fight.

There fell a great many Romans, both officers and common ſoldiers, in this combat: and among others, Ebutius a Decadarch, who as he had liv'd, ſo he dy'd, like a man of honour, and had given the Jews many ſenſible proofs of his courage.

A great action of Gallus a centurion, and the occaſion of it.

THERE was one Gallus, a centurion, who with ten Syrian ſoldiers lay cloſe concealed in a houſe: as the people of the family were talking together at ſupper what courſe they intended to take with the Romans, Gallus and his company, being all Syrians, overhearing and underſtanding them, fell upon them in the night, kill'd every man of them, and got off ſafe with his company to the Romans.

THIS was the ſevereſt blow that ever the Romans had as yet receiv'd; and Veſpaſian finding the ſoldiers caſt down upon it, (their confuſion being greater too for deſerting their general) he bethought himſelf how he might give them ſome ſort of comfort, without making mention of himſelf, or intermixing any thing of reproach. "Well! ſays Veſpaſian,

A glorious ſpeech of Veſpaſian to his ſoldiers.

"ſince misfortunes cannot be avoided, let "them be generouſly borne: and it is not for "any one ſort of men to expect an exemption "from the common lot of mankind. Whoever conſiders the nature of war, will find "that victory is not to be gain'd without "blood, and that fortune is variable; and "that this loſs is but a ſmall repriſal for the "thouſands of Jews that we have ſlain before. "But as it is vanity and weakneſs to grow "inſolent upon proſperity; ſo it is the mark "of as mean a ſoul to be caſt down with adverſity. Conſider again, ſays he, how inſenſibly the change paſſes from one extreme "to the other, and that no man is truly great "but he that ſtands his ground, and keeps up "the ſame dignity of mind in all conditions, "correcting the malignity of the one, by the "prudence of the other. We are not now to "impute our preſent miſcarriage either to the "want of reſolution on our parts, or to the "valour of the Jews: for, if they fought "better than uſual, or we worſe, the true reaſon was the odds of the ground we fought "upon. But if you were to blame for any "thing in this engagement, it was in truth, "for your raſhneſs in purſuing the enemy, "when they fled up the town from you. You "ſhould have held your hands, and contented "yourſelves with the poſſeſſion of the lower "town, till neceſſity ſhould have forced them "down to engage you upon ſafer, furer, and "more equal terms. But you were ſo impatient of conqueſt, that you never minded the "right way of obtaining it. Now the Romans are a people of order and diſcipline, "and not for this impetuous and inconſiderate "way of making war, like the Jews and Barbarians. Wherefore let us have recourſe to "our own methods of ſobriety and reſolution, "and act like men that are rather animated "with an indignation for what we have done "amiſs, than ſink under the burden of it. Every man hath this ſatisfaction in his own "power, if he will but ſet his own hand to "the work, and give himſelf the comfort of "revenging the loſs of his friends upon the "heads of thoſe that deſtroy'd them: in this "proſpect and confidence you ſhall find me "ſtill, as you have done already, the firſt and "the laſt in all dangers." This diſcourſe of Veſpaſian's put a new life into the army.

THE men of Gamala could not but take heart at firſt upon the fluſh of ſo unexpected a ſucceſs; but when they came afterward to conſider upon ſecond thoughts, and find that they were now paſt all hopes of agreeing upon terms, and in no poſſibility of eſcaping, (for their proviſions fail'd them) their ſpirits ſunk again, and their deſpairs almoſt diſtracted them: but they went on nevertheleſs, doing all that was poſſible to be done for the defence of the place, by ſetting their beſt men to look to the breaches, and others in general to take care of the reſt.

THE Romans by this time, having repair'd their platforms, and made ready for another attack, divers of the citizens ſtole away by paſſages ſo intricate and uncouth, that it was thought ſuperfluous to ſet any guard upon them. Others convey'd themſelves into ſinks and vaults, where they lay ſtarving for fear of being taken; the proviſions being wholly reſerv'd for thoſe that bore arms. But theſe miſerable people ſtood firm yet in all their diſtreſſes.

CHAP. II.

A faction in a body upon mount Itabyr. Veſpaſian ſends Placidus with a party to reduce them, who deſtroys them all, by encountering one wile with another.

VESPASIAN, though ſufficiently ingaged and buſied in this vexatious ſiege, found time, nevertheleſs, in that very hurry, to ſend out Placidus with a party of ſix hundred horſe to mount * Tabor, to diſperſe a multitude of people that were gotten together there. This mountain lies betwixt the great plain and Scythopolis: the aſcent of it is reckon'd to be about thirty † furlongs, no coming at it on the north-ſide, and on the top of it an open plain of twenty ‡ furlongs over; the whole encompaſs'd with a wall, which, as large as it was, coſt Joſeph but forty days the building: he brought water and other neceſſaries up to it from below, for the people had none but rain water for their uſe.

WHEN Placidus was come to the place according to his order, and found that there was no poſſibility of getting up the mountain to them, he allur'd them with hopes of peace and pardon, and brought ſeveral of them down to him, who pretended that they were wrought upon by the reaſon of his addreſs: but in truth they had a deſign to draw him into a ſnare and to ſurprize him; as Placidus had the ſame plot upon them too, if he could but get them off into the plain field, and ſeize them at unawares.

They made a countenance of complying with the fairneſs of what he ſaid; but Placidus, for all this, was too cunning for them in the concluſion. The Jews began the battle; and Placidus and his men, as diſmay'd, betook themſelves preſently to flight, and the Jews after them, continuing the chace till the purſuers were diſpers'd all over the field. Placidus took this opportunity, and turning quick upon them, kill'd ſeveral, put the reſt to flight, and not one man of them could get back to the mountain. Some of them quitted Itabyr, and fled to Jeruſalem; but the natives finding themſelves deſtitute of water, render'd themſelves and the place to Placidus, upon ſecurity for their good behaviour.

The deſtruction of Gamala. The fall of a tower puts the people into a panick terror. Titus enters the town without any oppoſition. A dreadful execution.

An obſtinate defence.

THE boldeſt of the Gamalites were now glad to hide their heads, and they that were unfit to bear arms ready to ſtarve; but the men of action ſtill perſiſting in the defence of the place, till the two and twentieth of the month * Hyperbereteus; upon which day three ſoldiers of the fifteenth legion ſecretly ſtole out before break of day, to the foot of the higheſt tower that was upon their quarter, and undermin'd it ſo privately, that the guards (it being in the dead of the night) never in the leaſt perceived them either coming or going. They made no noiſe, but only tumbling down five mighty ſtones that they had looſen'd in the foundation, they leap'd away in that inſtant and retir'd. The turret immediately fell to the ground with a moſt dreadful noiſe, daſhing the guards and all that were in it under the ruins. The horror of this accident frighted all the other guards from their poſts that were within hearing of it; ſome of them falling into the very mouths of the Romans; in which number there was one Joſeph, that was ſhot dead with a dart from a broken wall. But in the city the terror and confuſion was ſo amazing, that one would have thought the whole Roman army had been enter'd the town. Chares was at that time very ſick, and ſo terribly affrighted at this accident, that it was believ'd it haſten'd his end.

The fall of a tower ſtrikes the people with a panick terror.

THIS was a tempting occaſion to invite the Romans into the town; but they pay'd ſo dear for their late temerity, that they forbore till the three and twentieth of the ſame month to make any farther attempt upon the city. Titus, it ſeems, was now come up; who found himſelf ſo gall'd at the thought of the diſaſter the Romans had receiv'd in his abſence, that he drew out a body of foot, and two hundred choice horſe, and, in a grave, ſober march, enter'd the city without any oppoſition. The watch were the firſt that took and gave the alarum, and the news was ſpread all over the town in a moment. No ſooner was it certainly known, but the citizens, in a confuſion, like ſo many diſtracted people, fled yelling and howling up to the caſtle, hauling their wives and their children along with them. Some were cut off by Titus's ſoldiers; others that could not get into the caſtle, and went they knew not whither, fell into the hands of the Roman guards. There was nothing, in fine, but wounds and groans and death to be ſeen or heard of, in all forms; and the very ſtreets flowing with blood.

Titus enters the town.

THE next thing Veſpaſian had now to do, was to attack the caſtle; to which end he drew up his whole army thither. It ſtood upon the point of a rock prodigiouſly high and ſteep, and well nigh inacceſſable, with a multitude of crags and precipices round about it. Upon this diſadvantage, it was impoſſible for the Romans either to avoid the ſtones and ſhot of the Jews that were caſt down upon them from above, or to reach the Jews from below. But by a wonderful providence, in favour of the Romans, and for the deſtruction of the Jews, there aroſe a ſudden and violent guſt of wind, that drove the Roman arrows directly in the face of the defendants, and kept off the other from the Romans, or blew them askew beſide the mark. The blaſt at the ſame time was ſo ſtrong too, that the beſieged could not ſtand ſteddy where they were to make their defence, nor ſo much as ſee the people they had to cope withal. So that the Romans, with the help of theſe advantages, made themſelves maſters of the mountain, which they ſurrounded immediately; and in a rage of revenge for their former miſcarriage upon that attack, they put all they met with to the ſword, indifferently, whether they reſiſted or not: beſide that, in the horror of this deſperation, there were that caſt themſelves with their wives and children down the precipice from the caſtle, to the number of five thouſand perſons; that of the ſlain being only four thouſand: ſo much more merciful were the Romans to the Jews, than the Jews were to themſelves. The Romans, in this heat of fury, threw the very infants down the rocks, without ſparing ſo much as one ſingle creature; two women only excepted, the daughters of the ſiſter of Philip, who was the friend of one Joakim, a man of eminent quality, and formerly a general under Agrippa. Now theſe two ſiſters were not ſo much beholden to the clemency of the Romans, for their preſervation, as to the good hap of lying undiſcover'd till the rage and fury of the action was over. The rebellion of Gamala broke out the four and twentieth of the month † Gorpieus: and the place was deſtroy'd the three and twentieth of the month Hyperbereteus.

A cruel execution.

people of themſelves, were, upon the main, peaceably inclin'd: being moſt of them husband-men, whoſe hope and intereſt lay in plantations and tillage. Not but that they were tainted alſo with a conſiderable and ſeditious mixture of libertines that liv'd upon robbery; and there were ſome citizens alſo of the firſt quality that were corrupted with that leaven. The chief leader of this faction, and the perverter of the people, was one John; a wicked and deceitful man, a rank impoſtor; unſteddy and ambitious; a great maſter in the art of bringing his ends about; a wretch of no conſcience, and certainly known to be a promoter of broils for the making of his own fortune. He was, in fine, the ſon of one Levi, and the head of the rabble in Giſchala. If it had not been for him, the people would probably have ſent their deputies to the Romans, with propoſals of an alliance; but upon his inſtigation, they were prevail'd upon to put it off, till the war ſhould be brought on.

The people well diſpos'd, but ſeduced by a ſeditious impoſtor.

VESPASIAN, upon this juncture, ſent away Titus to Giſchala with a thouſand horſe; and the tenth legion to Scythopolis; returning himſelf with the other two legions to Ceſarea for refreſhment, by preparing both their bodies and their minds for difficulties that were yet to come. For Veſpaſian foreſaw that Jeruſalem would find him work enough; not only as it was a powerful, populous, and the capital city; but as it was a place of refuge to all the fugitives of the faction from elſewhere: a nurſery of bold and daring men; naturally ſtrong, and, over and above, well wall'd; though next to impregnable in the very ſituation of it. Veſpaſian took all theſe things into conſideration, and accordingly train'd up his ſoldiers, like champions, in the practice and exerciſe of their arms, to keep them in heart, and prepare them for the prize.

Jeruſalem a ſtrong and populous city

Veſpaſian provides againſt all hazards.

TITUS went up to Giſchala on horſe-back; and finding upon the view that is was not a place to ſtand an aſſault, he reflected upon it at the ſame time, that the ſoldiers would undoubtedly treat Giſchala as they had done Gamala; deſtroying the innocent with the guilty, if ever they ſhould come to take the town by ſtorm: ſo that, out of a generous compaſſion for the people, and the horror he had for thoſe inhuman cruelties, he rather bethought himſelf how he might gain the place by treaty. The walls being now cover'd with ſoldiers, and the majority within the town being of the faction, Titus call'd out, and, raiſing his voice, ſpake to them after this manner. "It is a wonderful thing to me, ſays he, "that, when all the reſt of your towns are "gone, and places much better manned and "fortify'd than yours is, and taken without "any difficulty too (many of them at the very "firſt attack;) you ſhould be now ſo inconſiderate as to think of ſtanding out: eſpe-"cially when you may yet be ſafe, eaſie, free "and happy, upon a fair return to your duty. "And this, I dare undertake, ſhall be made "good to you; and all your inſolencies par-"don'd, and paſs'd over, and imputed only "to an inordinate deſire of liberty. But if "you do not know when you have beneficial "offers made to you, and refuſe to caſt your-"ſelves upon the faith and honour of the Ro-"mans; if you ſhall reſolve at laſt, I ſay, to "run head-long on to your certain deſtruc-"tion, and to contend with impoſſibilities, "you muſt expect to feel the weight of the "Roman power and diſpleaſure; and you "will find, before you are aware, that your "wall will fall like dirt before their engines: "ſo that this is the way to ſhew yourſelves "to be the moſt arrogant ſlaves of all the Ga-"lileans."

The generous tenderneſs of Titus.

Titus offers them a peace and an amneſty, and the exerciſe of their religion.

THIS paſs'd without one word from the town in anſwer, none of the inhabitants being ſuffer'd to come up to the wall; for the faction were maſters, and had clapt guards upon all the gates, to ſee that none ſhould paſs in or out, to promote a treaty. But John at laſt cry'd out to Titus, in the name of the people, "That he accepted the conditions, and that "the town ſhould agree to them likewiſe, or "he would force them to it. Only he made "him him this requeſt, in regard of the in-"violable ſtrictneſs of the Jewiſh law for the "obſervance of their ſabbath, (which would no "more ſuffer them to treat of peace, than to "fight a battle) that he would indulge them "that day: it being a caſe wherein either the "complying on the one hand, or, as the Ro-"mans knew very well, the enforcing them "on the other, would be equally unwarrant-"able: beſide, that there could be no danger "in putting off the treaty to another time; "for, if they imagin'd that any man would "attempt to make an eſcape that night, it "would be an eaſy matter, by clapping guards "upon all the avenues, to prevent it: over and "above the reputation he would get by ſhew-"ing himſelf as tender of their laws as they "were of their own, and of their conſciences "as well as of their perſons; which was a "favour beyond their expectation."

John of Giſchala ſeemingly accepted the offer, upon one certain condition.

NOW it was not ſo much a ſcruple for the ſabbath, as an apprehenſion for his particular ſafety, that put John upon this treaty with Titus; for he was in a manner certain to be abandon'd and given up, if the town ſhould be taken; and nothing left him to truſt to but the night, and his heels, for the ſaving of his life. But the preſervation of John was manifeſtly an act of divine providence toward the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; as being the occaſion, not only of the truce, but likewiſe of Titus's incamping farther off the city, at Cydeſſa, one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt populous places in Tyria, and a mortal enemy to the Galileans.

John makes his eſcape in the night.

THE night being now come, and the town without any guards upon it, John laid hold of the opportunity, and made his eſcape to Jeruſalem; taking not only his military people, but ſeveral ſubſtantial men of the town, togegether with their families, along with him. The old men, the women and the children, that were frighted into this reſolution, made a ſhift to keep up with their leader for the firſt * 20 furlongs; but finding themſelves ſpent, andnot able to continue the march, they had no more to do but to betake themſelves to cries and lamentations; panting and trembling after thoſe that had outſtript them and were gone before: and the farther their friends were advanced from them one way, the nearer did they account themselves to their enemies the other; and upon the very point of being taken prisoners. Nay, the very noise of their own feet, they fancy'd to be the tread of their adversaries; and still looking behind them, they took their own people for their pursuers. In this imaginary fright they fell one over another, and the way was cover'd with the bodies of women and children, that were crush'd to death in the croud, by pressing who should get foremost. There was little more to be heard than the cries of miserable creatures to their husbands and friends to stay for them. But John call'd out to them on the other hand, to think of no other way of saving themselves, but by taking sanctuary in some place, where they might be reveng'd of the Romans, in case of any further mischief; and John's advice carry'd it. The multitude, upon this, dispers'd themselves, and shifted away the best they could.

* Twenty furlongs amount to two Engliſh miles and an half, and thirty geometrical paces, as has been before obſerved.

The people in a miserable distress and confusion

As soon as it was day-light, Titus came up to the walls of the town, to execute the treaty; where he found the gates open, and the inhabitants and their wives ready with acclamations to receive and acknowledge him for their benefactor and preserver. They gave him also to understand that John was fled away; begging his pardon for the innocent, and imploring his justice upon those left in the town that should be found to have been the authors of the revolt. Titus, upon their request, sent out a party of horse after John; but he was already gotten into Jerusalem before they could get up to him. They kill'd about two thousand of his party, and brought back again near three thousand women and children that they found wandring up and down.

Titus receiv'd into Gischala. Which puts an end to the conquest of Galilee.

Titus reasons the case, and acts accordingly

TITUS was not a little troubled at the escape of this impostor; and that they had not made him such an example as he deserv'd to be, when they had him in their hands: but then setting the advantages of the prisoners, the slain, and the taking of the town, against the disappointment of missing the single person of such a wretch, Titus balanc'd the one with the other, and enter'd the place in a friendly disposition toward the people; taking possession of it in form by the ceremony of his soldiers breaking off a piece of the wall, and reducing the authors of the sedition rather by menaces than by actual punishments. For Titus was of opinion, that in a case where so many family feuds, personal piques, and passions were concern'd, it might be a dangerous thing to make use of punishment, as a common rule of distinction betwixt the good and the bad, for fear of exposing the peaceable to calumnies, as well as the seditious to justice. So that, upon this deliberation, Titus thought it more honourable and human, rather to let some criminals live, than to run the risque of exposing some innocents; there being no place left for remedy and attonement, in the latter; whereas, in the other case, there may be hope of amendment; whether out of a fear of punishment, a sense of shame, or an impulse of virtue.

BUT Titus however in the conclusion put a garison into the town, partly to keep turbulent spirits in order, and partly to secure those that were of a peaceable disposition. This action finish'd the conquest of Galilee, after the expence of so much labour and blood.

Galilee totally subdu'd.

The Romans easier to the Jews than the Zelotes. An encounter in the temple. The character and history of John of Gischala.*

UPON John's coming up to Jerusalem, with a train of the faction at his heels, the people in vast throngs and multitudes gather'd about them, to know how matters went abroad, and, in a word, to learn the very worst of things. Now John and his company had run themselves so out of breath, betwixt fear and flight, that they were scarce able to speak; and that difficulty might have pass'd for an answer. But the party kept up the pride and vanity of their stomachs yet, with a pretence that they were not run away from the Romans; but came of their own accord, to find out some place for an engagement, where they might encounter upon equal terms: for none but fools and madmen would throw away their lives, they said, for the defence of Gischala, and two or three more such like weak and pitiful places, when the metropolis itself was at stake, and every brave man oblig'd, in duty and in honour, to do his best to defend it. John and his party colour'd the disgrace the best they could; but the people saw through the disguise, and that John's honourable retreat was no other than a downright running away. This discovery, and the story of the prisoners the Romans had taken, put the people into such a terror as if the ruin of Gischala had but been the prologue to the destruction of Jerusalem itself. But John all this while, without any shame or remorse for the poor creatures he had abandon'd upon the way, went officiously and pragmatically from one to another; animating the multitude to a prosecution of the war; derogating from the Romans on the one hand, and arrogating to themselves on the other; by which arts of quirks and imposture, they gained mightily upon the silly people. "Why, do you think, says he, "after so many baffles put upon the Roman "power and all their engines, by two or three "mean, despicable places in Galilee; and so "much difficulty in the mastering of them at "last; do you think, I say, after all this, "even if the Romans had wings, that they "could ever be able to take Jerusalem?" These bravado flourishes wrought upon a world of the hot-headed young men; but at the same time all people of foresight, sense and experience, gave themselves utterly for lost.

John imposes upon the multitude; and excuses his running away upon a point of honour.

John of Gischala the great incendiary of the war.

THIS

Jeruſalem in a confuſion

THIS was the confuſed face and ſtate of things in Jeruſalem at that time; but the country led the way to the ſedition that follow'd afterward in the city. For Titus being gone from Giſchala to Ceſarea, Veſpaſian went alſo from Ceſarea to Jamnia and Azotus, and ſubdu'd them both, ſettled gariſons in them, and ſo return'd: bringing a vaſt multitude of people along with him, that were now enter'd into a league with the Romans. The cities were all peſter'd with tumults and inteſtine broils; and no ſooner at peace with the Romans, but immediately together by the ears among themſelves: and war or no war was the ſingle queſtion; for the two oppoſites fought for the one againſt the other. The quarrel began in private families, that had been a long time adverſaries, upon the ſcore of hereditary feuds. It paſs'd thence into divided multitudes, that of friends became enemies: and it terminated at laſt in matter of faction and opinion; where men of the ſame mind ſided into an oppoſition of party to party, and ſo incorporated in a rebellion. This diſorder, in fine, was general. The men of action, youth and heat, were violently bent upon arms and innovations: the men of ſenſe and gravity, on the other ſide, were for moderate counſels; but the former carry'd it.

The Jews divided among themſelves.

The riſe and progreſs of the quarrel.

The fruit of an univerſal liberty.

THIS confuſion began with an univerſal licence, that every man took to himſelf, of robbing his neighbour, without any regard to law or conſcience. They proceeded afterwards to do the ſame thing in bands and parties; and to do it bareface'd too up and down the country: in which practice, the Jews committed upon themſelves more acts of cruelty and injuſtice, and did one another more miſchief than the Romans; beſide that the calamity was much more tolerable from an enemy than from a friend.

The outrages of the robbers.

THE gariſons, that conſulted their own eaſe, and mortally hated the people, were of no aſſiſtance to them in their ſufferings: till in the concluſion ſome of the principals of the robbers enter'd Jeruſalem, with a great body of their party, that they had pick'd up here and there. Now the city being under no rule of government, theſe ruffians met with no oppoſition: beſide that, according to ancient cuſtom, the gates were open to all Jews without exception; and at this time more eſpecially, when they took all people that came in to them for friends, and aſſiſtants. This was the caſe, and this liberty in the concluſion prov'd the ruin of the city; when the infinite numbers of idle and unprofitable mouths devoured the neceſſary proviſions, that were laid up for the ſoldiers that had the guard of the town: by which means, the miſeries of ſedition and famine were added to the calamities of the war.

Another band of thieves worſe than the former.

THERE came at the ſame time another party of thieves out of the country, that, joining with thoſe they found in the town (who were yet worſe than themſelves) ſtuck at no manner of inſolence, though never ſo flagitious and cruel. Robbery and pillage was as nothing with them, unleſs it was ſeaſon'd with downright murder: and that not by ſtealth neither, and in the dark, or upon ſome common perſons; but in the face of the ſun, and upon the moſt conſiderable men in the city; as they began with the impriſoning of Antipas, a perſon of the blood royal, and of ſuch credit and authority, that he was entruſted with the charge of the treaſury. They treated Levias afterwards, and Sophas the ſon of Raguel, with divers others of the moſt conſiderable perſons they could lay their hands on, after the ſame manner. Theſe horrid violences made the town look like a prize in the hand of a common enemy, and put all people to ſhift for themſelves.

NAY, and theſe profligate wretches did not ſtop here neither; but finding their priſoners to be men of power, intereſt, credit, and a vaſt acquaintance, they did not know but it might be dangerous to keep them longer in cuſtody; for fear of either a reſcue or a revenge from their friends, or of a popular tumult, upon ſo deſperate a provocation: wherefore they proceeded to a formal ſentence of death upon them, and ſent a blood-thirſty hireling of their own crew (one John the ſon of Dorcas) with a train of ten other bravos, to do the execution; and it was done accordingly. Now for a colour to this execrable villany, they gave it out that theſe people were in a conſpiracy to deliver up the city to the Romans; and not without valuing themſelves upon the merit of a publick ſervice, for doing ſo neceſſary an act of juſtice upon the betrayers of the common liberty.

A bloody ſentence and execution.

THE faction was now ſo daring and arrogant, and the people's hearts ſo dejected and diſmay'd, that they aſſumed to themſelves the diſpoſing of the pontificate; took the high-prieſthood out of the right line, abrogated the ſucceſſion, and promoted creatures of their own, without either blood or virtue, to the office: and ſo, by the choice of miniſters like themſelves, they made the government all of a piece; well knowing that the wicked inſtruments of wicked men would not fail to act inconformity to the humour and intereſt of their maſters.

They create and depoſe high-prieſts at pleaſure.

THERE was nothing wanting all this while of artificial calumnies, and feigned ſtories, to create miſunderſtandings among thoſe that had it in their power to croſs their deſigns, and ſo to make advantage of their diſagreements: till in the end, when they had glutted themſelves with putting affronts and indignities upon men, they tranſported their impieties even againſt God himſelf, and againſt his laws and his holy ſanctuary. But upon this audacious extravagance, the people, at the inſtigation of Ananus the high-prieſt, made head againſt them; a perſon no leſs venerable for his years, piety and wiſdom, than he was for his character; and one that probably might have preſerv'd the city, if he could but have got clear of the train of a conſpiracy that was then laid againſt him.

Putting indignities upon God himſelf.

Ananus the high-prieſt makes head againſt them.

THE faction took ſanctuary in the temple, and made uſe of it both for a place of defence againſt the multitude, and for the ſeat of their tyranny and uſurpation. But the moſt ſenſible part of the calamity was the mockery and contempt that attended it, in the wanton experiment of their own ſtrength, and the heartleſs deſpondency of the people. As for example, they took upon them to elect a high-prieſt by lot; according to the precedent, as they pretended, of former times: whereas, in truth, there was no ſuch precedent, but the ſacerdotal function was originally a family privilege, and and deſcended in a line by ſucceſſion. Now this practice of theirs was only a ſelf-ended invention of their own, to get the power into their hands. But they were taken in their own ſnare; for upon ſummoning one of the holy tribes (called Eniacim) in order to a choice, the lot fell upon a perſon that ſufficiently diſcover'd the iniquity and the corruption of the proceeding. His name was * Phanes; his father's name Samuel; born in a village call'd Aphthas; a man, in fine, brutiſhly ignorant, and ſo far from having any relation to a ſacerdotal family, that he did not ſo much as know what belong'd to the office. They fore'd him away however from his country affairs in ſpite of his heart; and, dreſſing him up in his prieſtly robes, as if it had been for the ſtage, they gave him his leſſon how he was to behave himſelf: making no more in ſhort of the whole ſtory, than if it had been the foolery of a farce, or of a frolick. This could not but go to the hearts of the prieſts, that ſtood all this while at a diſtance, ſpectators of theſe indignities, to ſee their holy laws trampled upon, and their worſhip and profeſſion ridicul'd; as they expreſs'd their ſenſe of it in tears and groans. But the people were ſo tranſported with the ſenſe of this oppreſſion, that they had no longer any patience for ſo ſcandalous a ſlavery; but join'd as one man in a reſolution to depoſe the tyrants, and caſt off the yoke.

Phanes choſen high-prieſt by lot.

A perſon wholly unqualify'd for the function.

The ſolemnity turn'd into a mockery.

The people bent upon a revenge.

THE two forwardeſt in this commotion were Gorion the ſon of Joſeph, and Simeon the ſon of Gamaliel; who made it their buſineſs to go up and down from man to man, inculcating the doctrine of liberty and revenge, provoking the people at the ſame time, one and all, to ſtand up for the vindication of their religion, laws and freedoms, againſt their prophane and ſacrilegious enemies.

Gorion and Simeon the heads of the party.

THERE was alſo one Jeſus the ſon of Gamala, and Ananus the ſon of Ananus, two prieſts of the firſt note for men of ſingular piety and virtue: theſe two holy men alſo as heartily excited the people, in frequent diſcourſes upon the ſame ſubject; upbraiding them with their ſloth and cowardice, and inflaming them by all manner of reproaches againſt the Zelotes. I call them Zelotes, as the name that they aſſumed to themſelves, out of an hypocrital oſtentation of holineſs; though at the ſame time, in their lives and practice, they were the lewdeſt of men. The people, being now gather'd together, were all provoked to the higheſt pitch of indignation, to ſee the havock theſe miſcreants made in the holy places, and how they went on pillaging and murdering without controul.

Zelote is only another word for hypocrite.

BUT yet, in the height of an outrageous horror and fury, there was no attack made upon them all this while; for the people did not as yet think themſelves in condition to encounter theſe Zelotes by downright force; as in truth they were not. Ananus the high-prieſt was at this time in the middle of the croud, and caſting many a ſorrowful look toward the temple, with tears in his eyes, he ſaid, "Why "did not I rather die than live, to ſee the "houſe of God thus polluted and prophan'd, "and the wickedeſt of men admitted promiſ-"cuouſly into thoſe ſacred places of privilege, "that were only reſerv'd for the high-prieſt? "Why do I live, and ſee all this, in my ſa-"cerdotal robes too, and with the venerable "name of the great God written on my fore-"head? What do I live any longer for, after "ſo glorious an opportunity now in my age "of ending my days with honour? What have "I more to do, in fine, under my circumſtan-"ces, but to fall alone, and give up my life "to my God and my duty? What ſhould any "man deſire to live for, in an inſenſible gene-"ration, and among people that have neither "the prudence to foreſee calamities, nor the "courage to reſiſt them? You ſtand ſtill to ſee "yourſelves robb'd, beaten and abus'd; and "your friends and companions murder'd be-"fore your faces; without ſo much as one "look, word, or action of tenderneſs or com-"paſſion that you dare own. A ſhameful, "and an inſupportable tyranny! But what do "I talk of the actors of the tyranny, and not "rather of thoſe that ſuffer it, and that train'd "up the tyrants themſelves to the power of "exerciſing what they now practice? Why did "you not cruſh them when you might have "done it; when they were but a few, weak, "and inconſiderable? No no, it was your pa-"tience and nothing elſe that made theſe "people your maſters. But when you ſhould "have turn'd your arms againſt your enemies, "you muſt be cutting of throats among your-"ſelves. You ſhould have call'd them to an ac-"count betimes, for the outrages they put up-"on your brethren: and you ſhould have "conſider'd that the ſufferance of one affront "naturally draws on, and encourages another; "as appear'd in what follow'd. For when "they found that they might commit all man-"ner of inſolencies without controul, they "advanc'd a ſtep farther, and put ſeveral of "the beſt men of the city in chains (who were "effectually betray'd by your tameneſs) and "dragg'd them to priſon, not only unheard, "and without a ſentence, but without ſo "much as an accuſation. No matter for their "names or qualities; but all this was done, "and not one perſon appearing in their fa-"vour. After the loſs of their eſtates and li-"berties, there remain'd nothing more to be "taken away but their lives: and that was "done too, and their throats cut, like ſo ma-"ny beaſts drawn out of the herd for ſacrifi-"ces, before our faces; and not a mouth o-"pen'd, or a hand lifted up, in their defence. "And after all theſe ſufferings, one upon the "neck of another, can you have the patience "now to ſee your holy altars prophan'd, and "your religion expos'd to ſcorn, without "ſhewing ſome reſentment worthy of your "profeſſion? and what is it that you are a-"fraid of, at laſt, but monſters of your own "creating, and the profeſs'd enemies of all "that's good and holy? If they ſtop here, it "is not for want of good will to be yet more "and more wicked, but for want of freſh mat-"ter to work upon: for it is impoſſible for "them to outdo the ill things they have done "already. They are poſſeſs'd you ſee of the "ſtrongeſt place of the city; and that which "you call the temple, ſerves them only for "an impregnable caſtle, maintain'd againſt "you. Conſidering now the ſtrength of the "place, and your enemies the maſters of it,

Ananus ſets forth the whole ſtate of the caſe, in a ſpeech to the people.

The cauſe notably reaſon'd from one end to the other.

" you propoſe to yourſelves? or what do you

" unleſs you fancy that the Romans will eſ-
" pouſe the cauſe of your religion and cere-
" monies; and in truth ſuch is the miſery of
" our preſent condition, that our very enemies
" cannot but pity us. Why if ſo many beaſts
" were in your places now, hunted, aſſaulted,
" and wounded, as you yourſelves are, they " would have the ſpirit to turn again upon
" their purſuers, and to revenge themſelves
" upon their enemies; while you at the ſame
" time ſuffer all tamely, without ſo much as " the ſenſe or apprehenſion of the brutes. But " will you bear this always, and ſink in infa-
" my, under the affronts, publick and private,
" that have been put upon you, without a-
" venging yourſelves? This abject patience
" looks, methinks, as if you had no longer a" ny ſenſe of the moſt natural and powerful
" of human affections, the deſire of liberty;
" and as if you had taken up, on the contra" ry, the love of ſlavery, inſtead of it: a
" temper, which I am ſure you never inheri" ted from your anceſtors; witneſs the many,
" and the dangerous wars they underwent a-
" gainſt the Medes and Egyptians, to aſſert
" their freedom. But what need of looking " back for precedents, when the very war we " are now ingag'd in againſt the Romans,
" (whether it ſucceed well or ill) is advanced
" evidently upon the ſame foot? and ſhall we " now that diſpute our liberties with the maſ-
" ters of the whole world, crouch and truckle
" like ſlaves to our own countrymen? To be " overcome by ſtrangers is but the chance of " war, and may be imputed, without loſs of " honour, to the iniquity of fortune: but for " people to give themſelves up in ſubjection to " their own brethren and countrymen, and to " the very worſt of them too, betrays a ſordid
" ſervility of ſpirit, and a ſoul prepar'd for " bondage.

" BUT now I am ſpeaking of the Romans, I " have ſomewhat comes into my head upon this " occaſion. Make it the caſe that we were all
" actually now their priſoners, (which heaven " forbid!) Whether would our condition, in " probability, be better or worſe than it is " now? for what miſery could an enemy in-

" things by their right names) the greater
" friend of the two: for while the Romans
" ſhew'd themſelves the preſervers of our " laws, our pretended friends that were in " our bowels deſtroy'd them. Certain it is,
" that theſe tyrants have betray'd your liber-
" ties, and that no puniſhment can be equal to " their crimes. I tell you no more in this now,
" than what you all knew before I open'd my
" mouth; and you need no other inſtigation
" againſt theſe men, than the ſenſe of your " own ſufferings. But you were afraid of their " numbers perhaps; the daring boldneſs of " theſe men, and the advantagious poſt they " are now poſſeſs'd off. Well! And what " was it, I beſeech you, but your want of re-
" ſolution, that rais'd them up to this, and " made them ſo conſiderable? And you have " no way left you now, but a ſpeedy,
" a generous, and a joint aſſociation among " yourſelves, to bring down again; for " delay gives time to ſettle; opportu-
" nity to encreaſe, and heart to gather cou" rage: like will to like, and the whole fac" tion will flow into the party; which will " make them numerous: and then they have " nothing to fear, where they meet with no
" oppoſition, and that makes them bold; and
" ſo for defering the attempt, the longer it is " put off, the more time they have to fortify
" and intrench. Now 'tis but one bold puſh,
" to ſhew that you are in earneſt, to humble
" their pride and inſolence; and you will find
" that, betwixt the terrors of a guilty conſcience,
" and the infamy of baſe actions, they will " have little joy of their ſtation. As who " knows but theſe impious wretches may be " cut off by the juſt judgment of a righteous
" God, as a vengeance upon them for their " contempt of his divine majeſty? And that " the very weapons they launce at us, may, by
" a providential miracle, be turn'd againſt
" their own hearts and faces; ſo that they
" ſhall not be able to ſtand the very ſight of " us, but with confuſion? or to put matters at " worſt; what if we ſhould fall every man of " us in the conteſt; could any thing be more
" glorious, than to lay down our lives at the " gates of the temple, for the honour of God,
" and in the ſervice of his holy houſe and
" cauſe? As to the conduct of the enterprize,
" you ſhall have my heart, hand, example and
" advice along with you."

Ananus makes a party againſt the Zelotes.

THIS diſcourſe of Ananus irritated the people ſufficiently againſt the Zelotes; but yet Ananus was ſo well inform'd of their number, their choice of men, and their courage; with the circumſtances of the place, and the poſture they were in; and finally, their deſpair of pardon in caſe they ſhould happen to be worſted; that he could not promiſe himſelf any preſent advantage from the effect of this management: but he was nevertheleſs reſolv'd to run all hazards, rather than abandon his country in this diſtreſs; the people in the mean time deſiring nothing more than ſome body to lead them on againſt theſe miſcreants, in defiance of all dangers whatſoever.

ANANUS, finding the multitude in ſo good a diſpoſition, made a choice of the beſt men he could pick out, and ranged them preſently in ſuch order as the time would bear. The Zelotes had their ſpies about Ananus; and, upon intelligence of his deſigns and motions, they march'd immediately toward him; one while, in ſmall parties, and then again in groſs bodies; without giving quarter to any one creature that fell into their hands. Ananus with great expedition got his men together, who exceeded the others in number; but the Zelotes however had the advantage of being better arm'd: though what was wanting one way, was ſupply'd on both ſides with reſolution and good-will another. The rage and indignation of the citizens doubled their valour againſt the Zelotes: and that of the Zelotes alſo, on the other hand, inflamed their reſolution againſt the multitude: the inhabitants found they could not be ſafe, unleſs they clear'd the city of the faction: and the Zelotes knew full well, that certain death attended them, if they did not come off victorious. In this diſpoſition, both parties ingag'd; and a skirmiſh began not far from the temple, by aſſaulting one another with ſtones. Thoſe that fled were cut off by the ſwords of their enemies; ſo that there were a great many dropt on both ſides. As any of the inhabitants happen'd to be wounded, their friends carry'd them off into their own houſes; but the Zelotes were convey'd up to the temple, where they polluted and prophan'd the holy place and religion with their blood. But the thieves came off ſtill in all their ſallies and excurſions with advantage.

THE people were now grown ſtrong and numerous, and out of all patience with the fugitives for not ſtanding their ground: inſomuch that, cloſing up the way behind them in their flight, they turn'd them back again upon the enemy; ſo that they were forced to cut out their way forward in their own defence. By this means, they were brought every man of them to the combat; and the faction, not being able to ſtand the ſhock of the whole body, gave way by little and little toward the temple; and Ananus with his troops, preſſing on furiouſly among them. When he had driven the Zelotes before him out of the firſt court, they got in a fright into the ſecond incloſure; ſhutting the gates after them in a hurry upon the purſuers. Ananus had too great a reverence for the holy place to make uſe of any ſort of violence for the forcing of his paſſage: though the enemy did all that was poſſible to be done, by their darts and ſhot from over their heads, to provoke him to it. But ſuch was the conſcience the high-prieſt made of polluting the holy temple with the mixture of an unpurify'd multitude, that, if he might have gain'd the main cauſe by ſuch a diſpenſation, he would not have admitted it. So that all he did at preſent was to order a ſtanding guard of ſix thouſand choice men upon the porches of the temple, and ſo ſucceſſively ſix thouſand more after them to do duty, and to be reliev'd by turns; not exempting the beſt men of the town from their part in this ſervice: only when it came to their lot, they were allow'd to hire men of an inferior quality to watch in their ſtead.

Ananus erects a ſtanding guard

THE popular party at this time carry'd all before them; but John of Giſchala, the fugitive before ſpoken of, ſpoil'd all again. He was a falſe, crafty wretch; ambitious beyond meaſure; an enemy and a traytor to the publick of a long ſtanding. In order to his ends, he began with making himſelf popular by ſetting up for a patriot. No man ſo aſſiduous at council with Ananus in the day-time as himſelf; nor any man ſo careful of the guards and watches by night. And he was at the ſame time ſo neceſſary a ſpy for the Zelotes, that there was ſcarce any thing that eſcap'd his knowledge: and what he knew, they knew ſo ſoon as he could give them information. And for the better diſguiſe of his pretended zeal for Ananus and the people, he was moſt officiouſly nice and forward in all his reſpects to the high-prieſt, and the great men he had to do withal. But ſo it fell out, that the very over-doing of his part laid him under a jealouſy; for it was too much to be true, and too much labour'd to be natural: beſide, that the flatteries were too groſs. Another thing that increas'd a ſuſpicion of him was this; that he thruſt himſelf into their councils ſtill, without being call'd. Ananus found that his ſecrets were betray'd, and none ſo likely as John to do it. But this wretch had play'd his game ſo artificially, and was ſo rooted in the good opinion of ſeveral great men, that there was no thought or poſſibility of removing him from his poſt: ſo that they could think of no better expedient for the putting of him to the teſt, than to give him an oath of faith and ſecrecy, to keep all the people's councils, and to ſerve them againſt all rebels to the uttermoſt of his power. John made no difficulty of ſwallowing this oath; and Ananus and his people as little of believing him without any further ſcruple: and thereupon, they did not only take him immediately into their councils, but ſent him ſoon after upon a commiſſion to the Zelotes, with propoſals of peace. The thing they fear'd was, leſt the temple ſhould come to be defiled with the blood of the Jews, and the blame laid at their door. This perfidious impoſtor went his way to the Zelotes with quite another ſtory; and told them, that the oath he had taken was ſo far from being againſt them, that, on the contrary, it was much in their favour. "I have, ſays he, run all manner of hazards for your ſakes, in the care I have taken to inform you of all the deſigns and practices of Ananus and his party againſt you. But I am now to tell you that neither you nor I were ever in ſo great danger as at this preſent, if God in his providence does not avert it. For Ananus hath prevail'd with the people to ſend deputies to Veſpaſian, to deſire him to come forthwith, and take poſſeſſion of the city; having order'd the people to purify themſelves the next day, to the end that, under a pretext of religion, they might either by fair means or by foul get into the town. I do not find, ſays he, under their circumſtances, how they ſhould be able to hold out long againſt ſo prodigious a number of men: but however, as God hath been pleaſed to order it, I am at preſent deputed to bring you a project of peace; which in truth is no other than a trick of Ananus's, to hold you in hand with the amuſement of a treaty, and then to fall upon you by ſurprize, when you think yourſelves moſt ſecure. But as to what you are to do now, you have no other choice before you, that I can ſee, than either to caſt your-

For, ſays he, " if you are taken, the very memory and con- " ſcience of what you have done, (appear as " penitent as you pleaſe) puts you out of all " hope of mercy; beſide that criminals prove " the worſe many times for repentance: over " and above that the thirſt for revenge in- " creaſes with the power of taking it with ſe- " curity. Conſider again what you are to ex- " pect from the friends and relations of thoſe " you have ſlain, and from a furious multitude " in the height of their rage for the diſſolution " of their laws and cuſtoms. Not but that " here and there a ſingle man perhaps may have " ſome ſenſe of humanity and tenderneſs; but " what will that avail againſt the impetuous " violence of a brutal multitude?" This diſ- courſe of John's ſtartled the people; which was the thing he aimed at. As to the fo- reign force he hinted at, he meant it of the Idumeans; though he durſt not venture to ſpeak it out in plain terms. After this he took ſome of the heads apart, and gave them ſome ſhort touches of Ananus's cruelty, and of the implacable malice of his heart toward them in particular.

CHAP. VI.

The Zelotes write to the Idumeans for aſſiſtance; which is granted them in a ſupply of near twenty thouſand men. Jeſus diſcourſes the matter with them. Simon the ſon of Cathlas to the high-prieſt. The Idumeans reſolve to make good the ſiege.

ELEAZAR the ſon of Simon, and Za- chary the ſon of Amphicalus, were look'd upon as two of the ableſt men the Zelotes had in their council, and the beſt qualify'd for buſi- neſs, either to adviſe or to execute: and they were both of the ſacerdotal race. Theſe men, taking for granted, that beſide menaces in ge- neral, their particular lives were threatened; and that Ananus and his party had call'd in the Romans to their aſſiſtance, as John had or- der'd the ſtory; they found themſelves ſo hamper'd under ſeveral difficulties, that they could not reſolve which way to turn themſelves: fancying in the firſt place that the very people would tear them to pieces. As to foreign ſuc- cours, there were none to be expected time e- nough to prevent the execution of the plot; for the blow would be ſtruck before their al- lies could have any notice of their diſtreſs. But in the concluſion, they reſolved to apply themſelves to the Idumeans, and wrote them a letter upon that occaſion to this effect. "Find- " ing that Ananus, having firſt ſeduced the " people, hath deſigned to betray Jeruſalem " to the Romans, we have retired into the " temple in defence of the common liberty; " where we are now beſieged, and upon the " very point of falling into the hands of A- " nanus and the reſt of our enemies, and the " city itſelf into the hands of the Romans, " without immediate relief."

The Zelotes in diſtreſs, write to the Idumeans for help.

THE bearers of this letter had ſeveral things in charge to deliver by word of mouth to the principals of that nation. The perſons choſen for the executing of this commiſſion, were two Ananias's; both reſolute men, good ſpeakers, maſters of the faculty of perſuaſion, and (which was equal to all the reſt upon this occaſion) men of ſpeed and diſpatch. They made no doubt of the Idumeans ready aſſiſtance toward the promoting of ſuch an affair; being a peo- ple fond of broils and changes, brutal and churliſh, and ſuch as needed no great art to ingage them in any thing of this nature; for they are a people that go to war as other peo- ple do to a banquet. Expedition was now the main buſineſs, and the meſſengers did their parts.

THEY were no ſooner come to the gover- nors of Idumea, and had delivered their letters and inſtructions, but the people went raving up and down like ſo many mad-men; provoking and incouraging one another to take up arms: inſomuch that they had gotten together a par- ty of near twenty thouſand men, that were all raiſed for the relief of the metropolis. This army was raiſed in a trice, and diſpatch'd away to Jeruſalem, under the command of John and James the ſons of Soſas, Simon the ſon of Cathlas, and Phineas the ſon of Cluſoth.

The letter is no ſooner read than the requeſt granted:

In a levy of near twenty thouſand men to their aſſiſtance, and upon their march towards Je- ruſalem.

ANANUS and his people knew nothing of the fore-mentioned deputation of the two meſ- ſengers from the Zelotes; but he was better informed however of the Idumean expedition, and ſo order'd the gates to be ſhut up, and the walls well guarded; but no act of hoſtility to be committed, till he had firſt try'd what might be done by reaſon and fair words toward the compoſing of the broil; ſo that Jeſus (the firſt prieſt next Ananus) mounted a tower over a- gainſt the Idumeans, and within hearing of them ſpake to this effect.

" OF all the calamities, ſays he, that ever " befel this famous city, nothing amazes me " more than to ſee fortune in a conſpiracy " with the lewdeſt people in nature to deſtroy " it. Who could ever have thought to have " ſeen you joining with a band of miſcreants " againſt us? and that too with more alacrity " than would have become you toward bar- " barians themſelves, if Jeruſalem had deſired " your aid? But if you are of the ſame mind " with your ſuperiors, this you have to ſay " for yourſelves; that a ſimilitude of man- " ners, naturally begets an agreement of af- " fections. But this cannot be the caſe be- " twixt you and them. For if you conſider " their lives and actions, you will not find one " man of them that does not deſerve a thou- " ſand deaths. As to their quality, they are " the very ſcum and ſink of mankind: and then " for their manners, after their ſquandring a- " way their fortunes in luxury and debauch, " they proceeded to rapine and pillage; and " ſtealing afterward into the city like thieves, " they advanced to ſacrilege and bloodſhed; " even in the holy temple itſelf: wallowing " in drink and ſurfeits, at the very altar, with- " out either fear or ſhame; devouring the " ſpoils of thoſe they have murder'd, and pro- " phaning the ſacred place with all manner of " pollutions. Now in the middle of this con- " fuſion, I find you advanced here in as regu- " lar a formality of order and equipage, as if " your army had been brought in at the re- " queſt of the whole body of the city againſt " a foreign enemy. What ſhall I call this " now, but the iniquity of fortune, to ſee your " whole nation united in ſo infamous a confe- " deracy againſt your own brethren? I can- " not Jeſus's rea- ſonings and propoſals to the Idumeans.

" not but admire, I muſt confeſs, at the ſud-
" denneſs of your reſolution, as well as at the " thing itſelf. It muſt be ſome great matter
" ſure, that could move you to take up arms
" for thieves and vagabonds, againſt your al" lies. But you have been poſſeſs'd, I per" ceive, with a notion of our calling in the " Romans, and betraying the city to them;
" and upon that pretence, you take upon you
" to ſet up for aſſerters of the liberties of Je-
" ruſalem againſt a foreign power. Now
" though this was a groſs and a malicious ca-
" lumny, it was yet pertinent enough to the " purpoſe of the inventors of it: for our ene" mies could never have gain'd their ends up-
" on men that value liberty at the rate that you
" do, and would venture ſo far for the pre-
" ſerving of it, but by poſſeſſing you with a
" rage againſt us, as the baſe and unmanly
" betrayers of a bleſſing and a privilege that " you have ſo great a veneration for. But you
" ſhall do well now to conſider, who they " are that thus belye and traduce us; and then
" make a judgment upon the whole, not up-
" on the credit of plauſible tales and hearſays,
" but upon the force of clear truths and con" vincing reaſon.

" How will it conſiſt that we ſhould diſ-
" pute our liberties thus long with the Ro-
" mans, and juſt now own them for our ma-
" ſters? How came it that we fell off from " them at firſt? or how came it that we did " not go over to them again, before our lands,
" towns and villages were totally laid waſte
" and deſtroy'd? Neither is this a time for a " treaty, if we had never ſo great a mind to it;
" for the conqueſt of Galilee hath made them
" too proud to hearken to any conditions. And
" then meanly to cringe to them to beg a peace,
" ſo ſoon as they ſhew themſelves before our
" walls, would be an infamy more inſupport-
" able than death itſelf. For my own part, I " am rather for peace than war; but, on the " other ſide, when the war is once begun and " inevitable, I am rather for a glorious death,
" than the life of a ſlave.

" But how ſtands the caſe, I beſeech you,
" of our ſending to the Romans? Is it that
" the ring-leaders have privately ſent ſome
" particular perſons out of their own number,
" or families? or will you have it to be a de-
" putation as the common act of the people?
" If this was done by a particular commiſſion,
" why are we not told the names of the com-
" miſſioners? Are there any letters to be pro-
" duc'd in proof of this ſuggeſtion? or hath
" any man been taken up going or coming up-
" on this errand? How comes it that among
" ſo many thouſands of people, as we daily con-
" verſe with in the city, not ſo much as one " man ever heard of it? And how comes it " again, that this ſecret, that has been manag'd
" with ſo much caution out of the city, ſhould
" be only known to a few perſons that are
" lock'd up in the temple, and not at liberty
" ſo much as to ſtir out of the walls? Is it not
" a ſtrange thing too that this treaſon ſhould
" never be heard of, till the reporters of it
" were in danger themſelves, and in dread of " being call'd to an account for their own
" crimes? Neither could it be call'd the peo" ple's act, without paſſing the vote of a ge" neral aſſembly; which would have made it
" impoſſible to be kept ſo long a ſecret. Or
" to what end ſhould there be a deputation
" too, when the thing was reſolv'd before" hand, and no room left for a treaty? And " then, as I ſaid before, they ſhould have done
" well to have named the commiſſioners. But " drowning men will catch hold of any thing;
" and all this ſhifting and ſhuffling is only for
" the ſaving of their own skins. But if it muſt
" be the city's fate at laſt to fall by treachery,
" none ſo likely to bring it to that end as our " accuſers themſelves; for 'tis but adding " treaſon to blood, ſacrilege, and the reſt of
" the impieties they are guilty of already, to " fill up the meaſure of their iniquities.

" But ſince you are here upon the place
" with us, and in arms, what can you do bet" ter than to join with us in the relief of the " city, and in the rooting out of theſe tyran" nical monſters? Wretches that have trod all
" our laws under foot, to make way for tu-
" mult and violence, treated our governors
" worſe than bond ſlaves, or common crimi" nals, in jails, chains, nay, and with death
" itſelf, though never ſo innocent; and which " is worſe, without ſo much as any pretence
" to the contrary, and without any place at
" laſt for prayers or interceſſions in favour of " the miſerable. This is no more than what " you may be eye-witneſſes of yourſelves, if " you will but enter the city as friends, and " believe your ſenſes. There you ſhall ſee
" the gutting of houſes, and the whole town
" in mourning for their maſſacred kindred and " friends; your ears entertain'd with nothing
" but cries and lamentations, and not one crea" ture to be found, upon the whole, but has " his part in this oppreſſion. And they have " carry'd up the inſolence to ſo extravagant a
" pitch too, that after the barbarous robberies
" and outrages, committed in the country-
" towns and villages, they have brought the
" ſcene likewiſe into the mother city itſelf,
" though the head and glory of the nation;
" carrying the outrage from thence alſo, into
" the very temple itſelf, which they have " made the ſeat of the war. From thence it " is that they make their ſallies, and thither
" their retreats; there they keep their guards,
" their ſtores, and their magazines: and at this " rate it is, in fine, that theſe profligates (of " our own tribe and extraction too) prophane,
" diſhonour, and trample upon God's holy
" habitation; and the place that is venerable
" all over the world, ſave only among our " own people. They are never ſo deſperate,
" but in the depth of their deſpairs; they ſtill
" take delight in forcing all things to extre-
" mities, and in ſetting cities and nations to" gether by the ears, and running all into a
" confuſion of civil broils. Now the moſt
" righteous and reaſonable thing that you can " do, (and that which might beſt become you
" too) would be, as I ſaid before, to go hand in " hand with us in delivering the nation from
" theſe firebrands, and in taking your revenge
" upon them for the impoſture they have put " upon you, and for preſuming to invite you
" into their party for aſſiſtance: whereas they
" ſhould rather have dreaded the vengeance
" and juſtice from you, that belongs to a com" mon enemy. Or if you take it to be matter
" of decency and reſpect, to pay ſome ſort of " deference to their requeſts, be but you plea-
" ſed to paſs into the city as friends; leave

" your

" your arms at the gates, make yourſelves " neuters, give the cauſe a fair hearing, and " be you yourſelves the judges of the contro- " verſy. But now for theſe people that have " ſo many notorious crimes to anſwer for them- " ſelves; and after the hurrying away of ſo " many men of quality to death, without ſo " much as the forms of either charge or de- " fence; for theſe people, I ſay, to be ad- " mitted to ſo impartial and eaſy a way of " trial, will be a condeſcenſion very extraor- " dinary, and it will become them to acknow- " ledge the obligation they have to you for " the favour. But if you will neither join " with us in the equity of the cauſe, nor ap- " pear in the quality of a judge betwixt us, " pray do but withdraw from both parties, " without either inſulting over honeſt men in " their affliction, or ſiding with traitors and " uſurpers againſt your mother-city. Or if " you are not as yet thoroughly ſatisfy'd of " our innocence, as to any ſecret correſpon- " dence with the Romans, do but ſend out " your ſcouts and agents to ſpy upon the paſ- " ſes and avenues; and whenever you find one " creature of us guilty of ſuch a practice, ſpare " neither the actor nor the party. Now that " will be the only proper time for you to ſtand " up for your metropolis: and there is no " danger in the mean time; for, as you are poſt- " ed, it is not poſſible for any enemy to inter- " poſe to your prejudice. If this may work " upon you, 'tis well; but if otherwiſe, you " cannot think it reaſonable for us to open our " gates till you lay down your arms."

THE Idumeans were ſo incens'd at their being ſhut out of the town, that they gave little or no heed to what Jeſus ſaid; and then for laying down their arms, it look'd ſo like a conqueſt, that the commanders would not ſo much as endure the thought of it. The multitude, upon this, fell into a kind of uproar; but Simon the ſon of Cathlas, one of the commanders, with much ado appeaſing it, took a ſtanding upon an advance-ground within hearing of the high-prieſt, and deliver'd himſelf to them after this manner.

Simon the ſon of Cathlas, to the high-prieſt.

" I DO not wonder, ſays he, to ſee the de- " fenders of our country's liberties ſhut up " here in the temple, when the very beſiegers " of thoſe patriots have likewiſe ſhut up the " city itſelf, which ought to be free and " open to the whole nation; but at the ſame " time ready enough perhaps to entertain the " Romans with garlands and acclamations. " 'Tis enough for us, you think, to talk to us " from your towers, adviſe us to lay down our " arms (though taken up in the common cauſe) " and not to truſt our neareſt friends with the " guard of the city. But inſtead of defending " our capital, we are held in hand with pro- " poſals of being made judges of the matter " in queſtion; and in the ſame inſtant, while " you are laying heavy charges againſt others, " for deſtroying your fellow-citizens without " any colour of law, you yourſelves pro- " nounce judgment at will and pleaſure upon " the whole nation, and violently keep your " own brethren out of a city that gives ad- " mittance, upon the account of piety and de- " votion, to all mankind beſide. But is this " your way then of acknowledging obligations? " Do you call it an expedition againſt you, and " a ſiding with your enemies, to make all the " haſte we could to your reſcue? At the ſame " rate are thoſe in the temple your enemies: " and you have juſt as much to ſay againſt us " as againſt them. You have at preſent the " very ſupporters of the commonwealth pri- " ſoners in the temple; and we are to be " ſhamm'd off with a pretence, that the end of " your keeping all the world out of the city, " is to avoid their tyranny: when in truth the " very tyranny you complain you, you your- " ſelves practiſe. Now this is too groſs to " paſs upon any man of common ſenſe and rea- " ſon. And keeping us out of the city is not " all neither; for we are barr'd by that ex- " cluſion, from the exerciſe and enjoyment of " the religious rites and ceremonies of our " profeſſion. And it is the ſame caſe again " with thoſe that are beſieg'd in the temple, " for puniſhing certain traitors that you are " pleas'd to honour with the title of honeſt " men and perſons of quality, for the credit " of the confederacy. Now the only thing " that they were to blame for, was, that they " did not begin with you: that is to ſay, at " the root of the conſpiracy. But if they were " over tender, it will concern us to act with " more vigour, for the maintenance of the " houſe of God, and of the rites of our coun- " try, as well within the city as without, and " againſt all oppoſers. So that this ſiege we " are reſolved to make good, till either the " Romans deliver you, or the conſcience of " what you have done amiſs bring you back a- " gain to your duty."

The Idumeans reſolve finally to make good the ſiege.

The Idumeans incamp under the city walls. A furious tempeſt; and the Idumeans ſhelter themſelves under their bucklers againſt it. Several forebodings upon it. The Zelotes adviſe in council how to ſecure their friends. The Idumeans enter the city by night, and join the Zelotes. A bloody maſſacre. Ananus and Jeſus are put to death.

THE Idumean army gave to underſtand by ſhouts and clamours, how much they were pleas'd with what was ſaid. But Jeſus, on the other hand, went away penſive and ſorrowful; not only for the untractable temper of the Idumeans, but likewiſe to find that the citizens had now a double war upon their hands. And the Idumeans were not much eaſier neither, partly out of an indignation at the affront of ſuch a repulſe, and partly to find themſelves ſo much miſtaken in the ſtrength of the Zelotes; for they were not ſo ſtrong as they imagined; and the difficulties of the undertaking made them half repent their coming. But the ſhame of returning juſt as they came, and without making any attempt, carry'd it againſt all other ſcruples: ſo that they reſolved (raſhly enough) to take up their ſtation where they were, and to incamp under the very walls of the city.

They poſt themſelves under the walls of the city.

ON the night following, there blew a dreadful tempeſt of wind and rain, accompany'd with ſuch terrible flaſhes of lightning, tearing claps of thunder, and ſuch bellowing of earthquakes, as put all people to their wits end, to think what theſe prodigies might portend.

A furious tempeſt.

THE inhabitants and the Idumeans were both under the ſame apprehenſion: that is to ſay, that God was incenſed againſt them for the war, and that ſome vindictive judgment threaten'd them both, if they went on with it againſt their mother-city: Ananus and his party, looking upon it all this while as a declaration from heaven in their favour, taking for granted that God would fight for them, and give them a victory without a battle. But the event ſhew'd them to be falſe prophets; for that which they apply'd to the enemy befel themſelves in the concluſion.

Several judgments and forebodings upon it.

The Idumeans cover themſelves with their bucklers againſt the ſtorm.

All that the Idumeans were able to do in the fury of this ſtorm, was to ſtand one to another as cloſe as they could preſs, and cover their heads with their bucklers; whereby they ſecured themſelves againſt wind and weather. The Zelotes all this while were in more pain for the danger the Idumeans were expos'd to than for themſelves; and ſo laid their heads together, to conſult which way it was poſſible for them to bring their friends off. The more daring part of the council were abſolutely for ſetting upon the city guards; and, after the gaining of that point, for downright forcing the gates, and making way for the Idumeans; arguing, that ſuch a ſurprize upon raw-ſoldiers, and men ill-arm'd, would ſo diſorder them, that they would find it a hard matter to appear in a body again; beſide, that they had moſt of them hous'd themſelves to be out of the weather. But let the danger be what it would, nothing (they ſaid) ſhould ever make them ſo baſe as to abandon their friends and allies, that came ſo generouſly to their ſuccour.

The moderate men were utterly againſt this way of adventure; giving for granted, that the guards at this time were undoubtedly doubled upon ſo critical a juncture; a ſtricter watch than ordinary ſet upon the walls, in regard of the Idumeans; beſide, that Ananus would be every where up and down, at all hours, upon his rounds, to keep the ſoldiers to their duty. And ſo it would have been any other night but that, when Ananus went to refreſh himſelf; not ſo much out of negligence and lazineſs, as by a judicial fatality that over-rul'd him upon that critical inſtant, to the ruin of himſelf, and his people: for the night being now far ſpent, and the tempeſt increaſing, the guards upon the temple-gates fell all faſt aſleep.

It came now into the Zelotes heads, that if they could but deſtroy the bolts and bars of the gates, the work were done: whereupon they took down certain ſaws and other inſtruments, dedicated to the ſervice of the holy temple, with which they fil'd and cut them to pieces; and it fell out ſo luckily, that, betwixt the raging of the wind, and the roaring of the thunder, the beſiegers heard nothing of the noiſe. Upon this, they ſtole away privately toward the city gates, next to the Idumeans; which they open'd as they had done the former. The Idumeans took it at firſt for Ananus attempting to make a ſally, and every man with his ſword in his hand made toward the paſſage, to oppoſe him; but upon finding their miſtakes, the Idumeans enter'd the city; and with ſuch a rage, that, if they had diſcharg'd it upon the people, as they were about to do, they muſt have put the whole body of them to the ſword. But the Zelotes earneſtly beſeeching them not to leave their friends in the temple in diſtreſs, for whoſe ſakes they came thither, and ſo expoſe them to ſtill greater dangers; and likewiſe reaſoning with them how much eaſier they would find the enterprize, if they began with the guards; whereas, if the inhabitants took the alarum firſt, they would gather in multitudes, and diſpute every inch of ground upon ſuch advantages, that they could never carry their point; the Idumeans were of the ſame mind, and ſo made it their firſt buſineſs to paſs directly thorough the city, to the relief of their friends that were priſoners in the temple; where the Zelotes waited their coming with great impatience. The Idumeans were no ſooner enter'd, but the Zelotes advanced out of the inner-temple, and join'd with them in a ſally upon the guards. Some they kill'd in their ſleep, while others took the alarum at the outcries of the people; and the multitude ſtood to their arms, though with all the confuſion in the world. But taking it at firſt to be only a party of the Zelotes, they made little doubt of overcoming them with numbers, and took heart upon it; but when they ſaw how others came pouring in upon them from abroad, and that the Idumeans had join'd the Zelotes, the greater part of them betook themſelves to cries and lamentations, dropping their courage and their arms both at once. Some few brave young fellows there were however, that had the hearts yet to make a ſtand againſt the Idumeans, and to cover the timorous common people; while others went raving up and down from place to place, making proclamation as it were of the ruin of the city. But not one ſoul that had the courage to ſtrike a blow, after it was known that the Idumeans were maſters of the town. The ſtreets rung of vain and fruitleſs exclamations, and mournful complainings, the ſhrieks of women in frights for the loſs of their guards; and all theſe clamours were made much more dreadful by the ſhouts of the Idumeans and Zelotes, and the tempeſtuous violences of the winds and thunder. But ſuch, in fine, was the natural barbarity and fierceneſs of the Idumeans, together with the vexatious thought of being ſhut out of the city, and expos'd to the ſtreſs of weather, that they ſhew'd no mercy; and whether they were in arms or upon their knees, it was the ſame caſe. Some pleaded religion; others, kindred: but death ſtopp'd all their mouths; and their condition was ſuch, that they could neither fight nor run away. Nay, the very fear of death contributed as much to the execution of it, in ſome ſort, as the rage of the enemy: for by preſſing ſo hard one upon another, they block'd up all poſſibility of retiring, and brought them ſo thick together, that their adverſaries made not one blow in vain. In this extremity of their diſtraction, ſome of them to avoid one death, leapt headlong down a precipice into another. There was a flood, in fine, of blood quite around the outer-temple; and by the time it was fair day-light, they computed eight thouſand five hundred dead bodies upon the place.

They join the Zelotes.

A bloody and inhuman maſſacre enſues upon it.

The Idumeans enter the city by night.

And this was not enough yet to quench the inſatiable fury of the blood-thirſty Idumeans, without turning their rage againſt the city; where they pillag'd all houſes indifferently, and kill'd all the people they found in their way. As for the rabble they look'd upon them as below their anger; but their main buſineſs was to wreak their malice upon the high-prieſts; which they did, by cutting off their heads ſo ſoon as they found them, and then trampling upon their bodies; making ſport with Ananus for his popularity, and with Jeſus for his harangue upon the wall, in a way of mockery and deriſion. Nay, they were come to that pitch of impiety, as to forbid them the rites of burial; though the Jewiſh laws, out of a reverence to the dead, have provided for the taking down even of executed criminals from the very croſs, and burying them before ſunſet. If I ſhould now date the deſtruction of this city from the death of Ananus, and reckon that Ananus and Jeruſalem fell both on the ſame day, I believe I ſhould not be much out in my account. For in the loſs of this man they loſt the ſupport of their government, and all hope of ſafety; and Jeruſalem was effectually as much put to death as Ananus: beſide that, over and above the dignity of his character and extraction, he was a man highly eſteem'd in the world for his perſonal virtue and juſtice; and his humility was yet the crown of all the reſt. He was a famous aſſerter of liberty and a common-wealth; for he had no intereſt of his own but to ſerve the publick: a lover and a promoter of peace above all things; for he knew well enough that the Romans were not a people to be baffled, and that nothing could ſecure the Jews but a fair underſtanding with the other. To ſpeak all in a word; if Ananus had liv'd, the Romans and the Jews would have come to an agreement. He was a moſt powerful ſpeaker, and had the talent of moving his hearers to a miracle. He had already humbled thoſe incendiaries, the Zelotes (falſly ſo call'd;) and the Jews, with ſuch a captain at the head of them, would have found the Romans work enough to do. He was ſo happy alſo as to have Jeſus for his ſecond; a perſon as much above all other men as he was inferior to Ananus. But it was God's will to purge this holy city as by fire, for all the pollutions and abominations that had been committed in it: and this was done by taking away theſe two illuſtrious perſons, which were the only means of preſerving it: two perſons that but yeſterday were venerable for their prieſtly robes; the heads and protectors of the moſt glorious religion under the ſun, and the darlings, not only of their own people, but of all foreigners that had the honour to know them; and now, in the turn of a hand, expoſed naked for a prey to dogs and wild-beaſts, to the aſtoniſhment and heart-breaking of all good men, to ſee virtue trampled upon, and iniquity ride triumphant.

Ananus and Jeſus put to death.

CHAP. I.

The cruelty of the Idumeans and the Zelotes. Twelve thouſand men put to death. Zachariah charged with treaſon before a mock court of Juſtice. The court acquits him; and the people murder him in the temple. The practice is diſcover'd; and the Idumeans diſcharge their priſoners, and leave the city. Gorion and Niger of Perea are put to death. Divine juſtice overtakes the tyrants.

The barbarous cruelties of the Idumeans and the Zelotes.

AFTER the horrid butchery of Ananus and Jeſus, (as aforeſaid) the common people were treated at the rate even of the worſt of beaſts, both by the Zelotes and Idumeans; who cut them to pieces as faſt as they found them: but for men of quality and thoſe that were in the vigour of their youth, they kept them only in cuſtody; in hope that for the ſaving of their lives they might be brought over to their party: but they choſe rather to die every man of them, than to join in a conſpiracy with traitors againſt their native country. And death was the leaſt part of their miſery too; for it was brought on with the moſt exquiſite of torments: and when the bodies of men were torn and mangled with ſcourges, till they were all over ulcers, and could hold out no longer, they had recourſe then to the ſword, for the finiſhing of the work. Thoſe that they took up in the day, were crowded into priſons at night; and as any of them dy'd there, their bodies were thrown out to make room for more; and the next comers to be ſerv'd after the ſame manner. Theſe horrid maſſacres put the people in ſuch a dread, that they durſt not own ſo much as a ſigh or a tear for the loſs of a friend, or any ſort of funeral rites for the neareſt relations they had in the world: nay, they durſt not ſo much as weep or mourn in their own houſes or chambers, without ſearching all the holes and corners firſt, to be ſure that no body was within hearing: for humanity was become ſo dangerous a crime, that it was death even to ſhew a tenderneſs for the memory of thoſe that were gone. All they could do, was now and then in the dark and by ſtealth to caſt a handful of earth or two upon the body; though ſome few were ſo bold as to venture upon it in the day too. This perſecution coſt the lives of twelve thouſand men of the firſt quality.

Twelve thouſand men of the beſt quality put to death with infamy.

THESE blood-thirſty monſters began now to be almoſt ſurfeited with this bareface'd, cut-throat way of murder, and had the confidence to ſet up a mock-court of juſtice, and to do the ſame thing over again under a form of law and equity. There was one Zachariah the ſon of Baruch, a man of the firſt rank; a friend to all good men, and an enemy to the wicked: a man, in ſhort, of great authority and virtue, and over and above, very rich. This Zachariah was look'd upon by the Zelotes, as a man ſo dangerouſly popular, that they themſelves could not be ſafe, they thought, without removing him. So they reſolv'd to take away his life; or, which was all one, to put him upon his trial for it. To this purpoſe they call'd together ſeventy of the better ſort of the people, under the name of judges; but without any ſemblance of a commiſſion to authorize them. This pretended court being met, the Zelotes exhibited exhibited a formal charge against Zachary, for being in a conspiracy to betray Jerusalem to the Romans, and treating about it with Vespasian. There was not the least colour either of a proof, or so much as any inducement to the believing of it; but the Zelotes said it was so, and therefore it must be so.

He makes an honourable defence.

ZACHARY perceiving manifestly that his life was at stake, and that the whole management was a cheat (for he had nothing to do with Vespasian) he gave himself without more ceremony for lost; but still in the abandon'd state of this despair, he govern'd himself in his defence with a serenity of mind and a freedom of spirit, well becoming the character of a man of honour and virtue. He began with contemptuous reflections upon the shameful practices and pretences of his accusers, and so proceeded to the evident calumnies and inconsistencies of their suggestions; briefly laying open the vanity of all their objections, and turning their arguments in their own faces; setting forth in order the whole course of their iniquities, and complaining by the bye of the troubled state of things. This generous and daring behaviour of Zachary transported the Zelotes into so malicious a rage, that they had certainly murder'd him upon the place, if it had not been to keep up the credit of their pretended judicature, by putting it to the experiment, whether their new judges would venture their heads or no, upon so dangerous a point of justice. When it came to the issue, the whole court pronounc'd the prisoner innocent, without so much as one man of the seventy that did not chuse rather to run the hazard of his own life, than to destroy so good a man by a sentence against all conscience and equity. This judgment of acquittal put the Zelotes into such an uproar, that they were all raging mad at the judges, for being such blockheads as not to understand to what end they were set there. Upon this, two of the rankest ruffians of the crew fell outragiously upon Zachary, and murder'd him in the middle of the temple, with this insolent railery in their mouths: "Now, says one of them, we "have given you our discharge too, and you "are much surer of this, than you were of the "other;" casting the body at the same time down the precipice under the temple. As to the judges, that were to pass the sentence, their lives were spar'd, and their punishment only a judgment of infamy, to be beaten out of the temple with the flats of the swords. By this means they were dispers'd up and down, so many eye-witnesses of the slavery of the capital city at that time.

The whole court acquits him.

Zachary murder'd by the rabble in the temple.

One of the Zelotes repents, and discovers the whole practice.

THE Idumeans themselves were so disgusted at this way of proceeding, that they curs'd the hour of their coming; and so confering about it, they had secret intelligence given them by one of the Zelotes, of the history of the people that invited them in. "True it "was, he said, that they did take up arms "upon the credit of a report that the high-"priests were treating with the Romans for "the betraying of the city; however, upon "further enquiry, they found nothing at all "in it; but, on the contrary, the pretended "asserters of our liberties were actually the "subverters of them, and they themselves the "tyrants that ought to have been timely sup-"press'd. But, says the Zelote, since it hath "been your unhappy lot to join with them "thus far in their iniquities, it will be high "time for you to break off so criminal an al-"liance with the profess'd enemies of your "laws and country. You took it ill to be "kept out of the town; and are you not suf-"ficiently reveng'd, do you think, upon those "that excluded you, in the death of Ananus, "and so many thousands of the citizens in one "night? an action, says he, which many of "your people will live to repent. But I "speak this only to shew you the barbarity of "your confidents, that had the impudence to "commit these shameless cruelties even be-"fore the faces of their preservers, and by "doing the basest things that ever were heard "of in the sight of their allies, to transfer the "infamy from the Zelotes to the Idumeans; "who in truth should either have hindred "them, or left them. Now, says he, since "it is as clear as the sun, that the whole sto-"ry of the conspiracy is nothing but a calum-"ny, and that there is no such thing in pros-"pect as the dread of a Roman army; beside "the impregnable strength of this city, if it "were true to itself: since thus it is, I say, "what have you more to do than to return "whence you came; and, by abandoning these "monsters, to expiate in some sort for the ill "things you did in their company? wherein "you are thus far excusable, that you were "rather passive under a well meaning mistake, "than voluntary actors at your own liberty "and choice." This discourse had such an effect upon the Idumeans, that they forthwith set all their prisoners at liberty, which were near two thousand; left the city, and so went to Simon, (of whom hereafter) and then home.

Upon this discourse the Idumeans discharge their prisoners, and leave the city.

THIS unexpected departure of the Idumeans was equally a surprize both to the inhabitants and to the Zelotes, though upon several accounts: for the people, that knew nothing of the other's repentance, took heart upon it, and comforted themselves in the thought of such a deliverance: the Zelotes, on the other hand, grew as insolent upon it, in a confidence of their own strength, and to consider that the check being now taken off that kept them in some sort of awe of the Idumeans, they were now at liberty to go their own way without any restraint of scruple, consideration or delay: so that every thing was now done in a hurry, without deliberation or counsel. They stuck at nothing, though never so wicked; and whatever came in their heads, it was no sooner thought than executed.

Gorion and Niger of Perea put to death.

BUT their greatest and most deadly spite was against men of bravery and honour; and those they persecuted to the uttermost extremity; the nobility out of envy, the men of resolution and virtue out of fear: for they could never think themselves safe so long as any man of that character was alive. This was it that made them put Gorion to death, with several others; a man eminent for his extraction and virtues; couragious, and a lover of the people and of liberty, no creature more; and, in fine, this spirit of liberty, (together with his other good qualities) was his ruin. Niger of Perea fell also under the same disastrous fate: a man of a try'd valour and conduct against the Romans; shewing and glorying in the wounds and scars he had receiv'd in the service of his country, as they dragg'd him along the streets. When they had him out of the gates, and that he

he gave himſelf for dead, he made them this one earneſt requeſt, that his body might be bury'd: but it was deny'd him; and ſo they put him to death, with this prophetical imprecation in his laſt breath, that the Romans might come to avenge his blood, and divine juſtice overtake them with famine, ſword, peſtilence, and mortal diviſions among themſelves, anſwerable to the enormity of their crimes.

Divine vengeance overtakes them.

It was not long before God in his righteous providence poured down all theſe plagues upon them, as foretold, beginning with their inteſtine broils. The death of Niger ſet their hearts at eaſe as to any farther danger that way. But there was not yet ſo much as one common man that they did not find ſome occaſion or other to pick a quarrel with. Some they put to death for things done and paſt, and for diſaffections of old date. In other caſes, where there was no matter of fact againſt a man, a bare jealouſy or poſſibility was enough to deſtroy him. If they made court to the faction, they were ſpies; if they kept off, it was interpreted envy and contempt: but whether the pretended crime was great or ſmall, the penalty was ſtill the ſame; and no one eſcap'd them unleſs he had neither money nor honour.

CHAP. II.

The Jews miſerably confounded. The officers preſs Veſpaſian to rigour; but Veſpaſian is for moderation. The Zelotes go over daily to the Romans. Horrid perſecution and oppreſſion. The deſtruction of Jeruſalem foretold by an antient prediction.

The Jews miſerably divided.

The Roman officers preſs Veſpaſian to make advan- of it.

Veſpaſian adviſes temper and moderation.

THE Roman officers having their hearts ſet upon Jeruſalem, could not wiſh a fairer opportunity for the advancing of their deſign, than by laying hold of the diſtractions in the city: to which end, they apply'd themſelves to the general, Veſpaſian, by all means to improve the providence of the preſent occaſion, without allowing the Jews one moment of time to bethink themſelves: for they would either agree or tire, or repent, or ſomething or other; and the work would be then to begin again: repreſenting alſo at the ſame time, that the hand of God did moſt evidently appear, upon theſe factions, in favour of the Romans. The general gave them this anſwer: "That their bravery was more than their po- "licy; and that they conſider'd the glory of "the action in the oſtentation of their courage, "(as if it were to fight a prize) more than the "prudence and advantage of it. For, ſays he, "to attack the city raſhly and precipitately, "would be the ready way to make them all "friends again, and to draw their forces upon "us, which are very conſiderable, into a "conjunction as againſt a common enemy; "whereas if we do but wait a while with a "little patience, they'll do our buſineſs to our "hands, in ſpending their numbers and their "ſpirits one upon another. For God does "better for us than we could do for ourſelves, "in delivering up the Jews to the Romans "without labour or peril, and giving us "victory without ſo much as a battle. Are "they not already deſperately engaged in a "civil war (which is the heavieſt of all judgments) and cutting throats among themſelves like ſo many mad-men? and who but "a mad-man then, will enter into a needleſs "conteſt with mad-men, and run the risk of "bearing a part in the tragedy, when he may "do his buſineſs better in the quality of a ſpectator? Theſe people, I tell you, are hot-"headed, and rather than not be deſtroy'd "they'll kill one another. As for thoſe that "look upon a cheap victory to be inglorious, "they ſhould do well to ſet the advantages of "a temperate accommodation without blood "againſt the uncertain chance of war. This "is not to derogate from the honour of mili-"tary virtue; for provided the ſame thing "be done, what matters it whether by arms "or by counſel? But yet undoubtedly that "muſt needs be the beſt way of doing it, "which at the ſame time weakens the enemy, "and keeps our own men by daily exerciſe in "diſcipline and in breath. Neither, ſays he, "is this a time for us to propoſe to ourſelves "the fame of a glorious exploit, when the "Jews are doing our work for us, and mind "neither their arms, their fortifications, nor "their walls, nor the making of intereſt and "friends; but by tearing one another's "hearts out, and doing the part of the worſt "of enemies one to another; till they have "brought themſelves into ſuch a condition, "that the beſt they can hope or wiſh for, is "to be our ſlaves. Now as to the prudence "and honour of the matter in queſtion; if "they have a mind to deſtroy one another, "why ſhould we hinder them; nor is there, "in fine, any reputation to be gotten by a "victory, that was rather caſt upon us by the "faction of the one ſide, than gain'd by the "valour of the other; and this is effectually "the truth of the caſe."

Deſerters go over daily from the Zelotes to the Romans.

Tyranny and oppreſſion to the higheſt degree.

This was Veſpaſian's ſenſe of things, and the officers were of the ſame opinion with their general; as it appear'd they had reaſon to be by that which follow'd ſoon after. For there came over deſerters to him from the Zelotes in great numbers, day after day; tho' the ways and paſſes were ſo beſet, that it ſeem'd almoſt impoſſible to eſcape. They put every man to the ſword that they took, upon a pretence that he was running away to the Romans: that is to ſay, unleſs he redeem'd himſelf for a ſum of money, and that brought him off. So that there was no treachery but where there was no caſh; for the rich compounded, and the poor were left in the lurch. The maſſacre was ſo outrageous, that the dead bodies lay pil'd up in heaps upon the highways; and many that were thinking to get off, chang'd their minds, and choſe rather to periſh in the city, only in hope of a little earth to cover them. Nay, ſuch was the extravagant barbarity of theſe monſters, that they would not allow burial to any creature either within the city or without; but, like profeſs'd enemies to the inſtincts of nature, as well as the rights of their country, they affronted God and man indifferently, and expoſed the bodies to lie rotting above ground in the face of the ſun. Nay, and it was as unpardonable a crime to attempt the burying of a friend, as to go over to the enemy; and he that had but newly bury'd another, wanted a friend the next moment to do the ſame office for himſelf. There was no ſuch thing left among them as com-compaſſion (the moſt human of all our affections) but it was wholly extinguiſhed in the hearts of theſe miſcreants; and miſery was made rather a provocation to rage, than a motive to pity.

THE ſpectacle, in fine, was ſo frightful, that it made the living envy the dead; and the want of a grave was nothing to the miſeries of a priſon: and they did not only trample upon all that was ſacred among men, but trifled with divinity itſelf, and made no more account of the oracles of the prophets, than of ſo many dreams or fables. But yet after the contempt of all the laws and precepts of their forefathers, concerning the meaſures of good and evil, they found the denouncing predictions to be yet made good in the concluſion againſt themſelves and their country. For there was a traditional prophecy handed down to them from antiquity, that in time to come there ſhould break out a violent ſedition in Jeruſalem; and that the Jews themſelves with their own hands ſhould prophane the holy temple: the city to be afterwards taken, and all that was ſacred belonging to it laid in aſhes. The Zelotes made no doubt of the authority of this prophecy, and put their own helping hands to the execution of it.

The deſtruction of Jeruſalem according to an ancient prediction.

diſdain to own him for their maſter that had ſo lately been their enemy. But the thing that wrought more upon them than all the reſt, was the averſion they had to a ſingle perſon, and the deſpair of getting him out again if he were once poſſeſs'd of that dignity: beſide, that he would never forgive thoſe that oppos'd him in his pretenſions at the beginning. The people, upon theſe deliberations, came at laſt to a reſolution, rather to ſtand the worſt of a war, than to periſh under the infamy of making themſelves voluntary ſlaves. The faction, upon this, divided into two parties; John putting himſelf at the head of the Anti-Zelotes. They ſtood both upon their guards one againſt the other; and not without ſome ſlight skirmiſhes too: but rather againſt the people than betwixt themſelves; for the ſingle point in queſtion was only this, which of the two parties ſhould get the greater booty.

The factions divided into Zelotes and Anti-zelotes. John ſides with the latter.

JERUSALEM being at this time labouring under three terrible judgments; war, tyranny and ſedition; the people, taking the war to be the moſt tolerable of the three, quitted their habitations, and fled from their own countrymen for ſanctuary to ſtrangers, and found afterwards, that ſafety and protection among the Romans, which they could not obtain one from another.

Three heavy judgments upon the Jews.

THE three judgments above-mentioned were now followed with a fourth; which contributed as much to the deſtruction of the Jews as any of the reſt. There ſtood a caſtle not far from Jeruſalem called Maſſada; a piece of great antiquity, and of mighty ſtrength and importance. It was erected, and made uſe of, by our kings in former times for a royal treaſury, and a magazine of all manner of ſtores, and neceſſaries for war; and for an impregnable retreat in a time or caſe of danger. It was now fallen into the hands of a band of bravo's, commonly called Sicarii. There were not enough of them to kill, burn, and over-run the country bare fac'd; but the miſchiefs they had done hitherto were by treachery and ſurprize. It happen'd, upon this juncture, that the Roman army lying quiet and out of action, and the Jews at the ſame time ſplit into factions, and tearing out one anothers throats among themſelves, theſe aſſaſſins took advantage of the occaſion to make a bolder attempt than ever they durſt venture upon before. It was now the feaſt of unleavened-bread; a feſtival celebrated by the Jews with great ſolemnity, in memory of their deliverance out of the Egyptian bondage, and their tranſlation into the land of promiſe. On that night, the ruffians broke into Engaddi by ſurprize, ſcatter'd the people, and maſter'd the place, before the inhabitants could recover their arms. They drove them out of the town; and after killing upwards of ſeven hundred perſons upon the chace, moſt of them women and children, they rifled their houſes, and carry'd away all the fruits that were ripe and in ſeaſon to Maſſada: depopulating all the towns, villages, caſtles, and country thereabouts, after the like manner. Their numbers increas'd daily, by the acceſſion of a looſe abandon'd rabble that came flocking in to join them. Judea, that till now lay eaſy and quiet, became the very ſcene of all manner of violences upon that inroad, from the one end of the country to the other. But as it is in our bodies,

*John ſets up for ſovereign power. A ſharp wit and good ſpeaker. There are Zelotes and Anti-zelotes; and John ſides with the latter. Three heavy judgments upon the Jews, and a worſe yet behind. John of Giſchala ſets up for ſovereign power.

THE ambitious heart of John of Giſchala was grown now too big to content itſelf with any thing leſs than ſovereign power, the attaining of which was a project that he had a long time form'd in his thoughts; ſo that withdrawing inſenſibly from the fellowſhip of his companions, and engaging by little and little, a party of profligate ruffians into his intereſt, his buſineſs was now to ſet up for himſelf. He had a humour of impoſing his own orders and opinions imperiouſly upon others, and of treating theirs again with contradiction and contempt: and this he did out of a manifeſt affectation of a ſole and abſolute power. Some join'd with him out of fear, and ſeveral out of affection and good will: for he was the greateſt maſter of words in nature, and of the art of moving the affections. Many follow'd him for their own ſecurity, in hope that all the ills that they had done would be laid at his door as the firſt mover of them, whenever they ſhould be call'd to an account for their evil doings. The martial part of his train ſtuck to him as he was a man of reſolution and conduct: but divers yet of the adverſe party fell off from him; ſome out of envy and greatneſs of ſtomach, in a kind of dies, when any of the nobler parts are indiſpos'd, all the reſt partake of it; juſt ſo it fares in the caſe of a ſeditious and diſorderly city. When the capital is ſick, all the parts ſuffer by conſent; as well as they tranſgreſs by example. When they had plunder'd all within reach, they march'd off with the booty into ſolitudes and deſerts; where they aſſociated in conſpiracies, and gather'd together multitudes of free-booters, little inferior to formidable armies, and ſufficient to deſtroy cities, and lay temples deſolate. The ſufferers did not forget (as it is natural enough, and common practice) to revenge themſelves upon their oppreſſors, whenever they could come at them: but that was very rarely; for the thieves were too nimble for the honeſt men, and got off with the prey, before the purſuers could reach them. But ſo it was in fine, that there was not one inch of ground in Judea that did not partake in the calamities of the capital city.

The Jews hold ſecret intelligence with Veſpaſian, and ſue to him for relief.

THE faction had guarded all the avenues with the uttermoſt ſtrictneſs and caution imaginable; ſo that not a creature could ſtir without the hazard of his life: but all this precaution and rigour did not hinder ſeveral deſerters yet from ſtealing away privately, day after day, with intelligence of the ſtate of the town to Veſpaſian; and to implore his relief in the names of the miſerable remainder of a diſtreſſed city: great numbers of the citizens having loſt their lives already for their good will to the Romans, and a great many more at preſent in danger of periſhing by the ſame fate. Veſpaſian, in a generous tenderneſs for the caſe and condition of an unhappy people, advanced with his army nearer the town: not, as ſome imagin'd, to lay a cloſe ſiege to it; but upon a proſpect (in truth) of delivering them from any ſiege at all, by reducing all ſtrong holds about it in the firſt place, ſo as to leave no obſtacle from abroad to thwart him in his deſign.

Veſpaſian in a generous tenderneſs draws toward the town.

WHEN he came to Gadara, the richeſt and the ſtrongeſt town beyond Jordan, and the metropolis of that province, he entered the place * on the fourth of the month Dyſtrus, upon an invitation from ſome of the leading men by their deputies to come and take the town into his protection: which they did to ſave both their lives and eſtate, being a very wealthy people. The faction knew nothing of this tranſaction, but as they gueſſed at it by Veſpaſian's drawing nearer the walls. They were now in a great ſtreight, and knew not which way to turn themſelves, or what to do. They found it utterly impoſſible for the town to hold out againſt ſo many enemies both within and without; the majority of the citizens againſt them, and the Roman army at hand. So that they had nothing now to truſt to but flight; which was a point that in honour could not be reſolved upon, without taking a revenge firſt upon ſome of the authors of their ruin. Upon this conſideration, they took up Doleſus, the firſt man of the city both for blood and merit; over and above that he was the author and the adviſer of the aforeſaid embaſſy. They took him, in fine, into cuſtody, and cauſed him to be put to death; ordering the dead body to be whipt and ſcourg'd; and that being done, they ſlipt away all out of town.

Gadara invites and receives him.

The faction betake themſelves to flight.

UPON the nearer approach of the Romans towards the city, the inhabitants met Veſpaſian upon the way, and conducted him into the town with gratulatory acclamations: and beſide the ceremony of oaths of fidelity, and other aſſurances of that kind, common in the like caſes, they made it their own act to demoliſh their own walls; as a farther ſecurity for their good faith and peaceable intentions, by putting it out of their power to do miſchief if they would never ſo fain. Veſpaſian, after this, gave them a gariſon of horſe and foot for their ſafeguard; ſent away Placidus with five hundred horſe and three thouſand foot after the fugitives; while he himſelf with the reſt of his troops went back to Ceſarea.

Placidus follows the purſuit, and puts them all to the rout.

WHEN the fugitives found themſelves purſu'd, and a party of horſe at their heels, they turned off into a village call'd Bethennabris, before the Romans could come up to them; where there was a parcel of ſtout young fellows, to a conſiderable number. Some of them they engag'd by fair words to join with them; others they forc'd: and with this party they ſally'd out, and made a raſh and a deſperate charge upon Placidus; who gave ground upon the very firſt puſh, but it was only to draw them a little farther from the town: which ſucceeded accordingly; for Placidus got them out into a place of advantage, and there ſet upon them, and put them to the rout. Thoſe that fled for their ſafety were intercepted by the Romans; thoſe that fought were cut off by their foot; they were beaten, in ſhort, quite off their mettle. When they attack'd the Romans, they might as well have charg'd a wall or a rock; for they ſtood ſo firm and cloſe, that there was no breaking the body: and they lay upon ſuch a guard under their arms too, that no lance or dart could touch them. Whereas the Jews, on the other hand, lay expos'd to all ſorts of weapons, and to all manner of aſſaults; till in the end, being teized into a brutal rage, they caſt themſelves like the fierceſt of wild beaſts upon the points of their enemies ſwords, and ſo periſh'd: ſome were ſlaſh'd over the faces; others diſperſed by the horſe, and trampled under foot. Now Placidus made it his particular care, as far as poſſible, that none of the fugitives ſhould get back into the town: wherefore, as any of them offer'd at it, he and his people interpoſed with their horſes betwixt them and home, and ſo forc'd them off again. Thoſe that were within reach, they kill'd with their lances, and others at a diſtance they intercepted: but ſome yet that were ſwifter and ſtronger than the reſt, made their way to the very wall; and now the watch were under great diſtraction and perplexities, whom to let in and whom to keep out; for it would be hard they thought to open the gates to the townſmen, and refuſe entrance to thoſe of Gadara: and then, on the other ſide, they were afraid leſt by opening to all indifferently, they might endanger the loſs of the place; as it came afterwards very near the matter. For the Romans having purſu'd ſome of the fugitives up to the wall, were within a very little of falling furiouſly into the town with them:

The fugitives make away to Bethennabris.

but

but with much ado they made ſhift to get the gates ſhut, and ſo prevented it. Placidus, upon this, gave a vigorous aſſault to the place; and follow'd it ſo cloſe, that he made himſelf maſter both of the wall and of the village, that afternoon. The wretched common-people that had no means of defence, were all put to the ſword, and the reſt did what they could to ſave themſelves by flight; and carry'd the terror along with them, wherever they came, all over the country. But now to finiſh the calamity, they firſt pillag'd the houſes, and then laid the village in aſhes.

Placidus rifles the place, and lays it in aſhes.

THE miſery was very great in the truth of the fact; but made much greater in the report yet than it was. For they gave it out all the the way they paſs'd, that the whole Roman army was coming toward them. This alarum put the country into ſuch a fright, that they quitted their habitations upon it, and in prodigious numbers retir'd into Jericho; being a ſtrong, a populous, and a well fortify'd gariſon, and conſequently the ſafeſt retreat they could think of. Placidus, in the courſe of his ſucceſſes and good fortune, purſu'd them to the river Jordan; putting every ſoul to the ſword that he overtook upon the way. When the fugitives came to the river-ſide, the waters were ſo out upon a great fall of rain, that there was no paſſing; nor as the caſe ſtood, any poſſibility of getting away. In this difficulty they found themſelves under an abſolute neceſſity of putting it to a battle. The Jews poſted themſelves along the bank of a river; which they made good for a while, againſt the attack and darts of the Roman horſe: but when they came to be once broken, what betwixt thoſe that were puſhed into the river, and others that were ſlain, the loſs of the men was not to be computed. They reckoned upon fifteen thouſand kill'd upon the place; about two thouſand two hundred taken, beſide a mighty booty of ſheep and aſſes, camels and oxen.

The country frighted with a falſe alarum

The Jews forced upon a battle.

A prodigious victory and booty.

THIS diſaſter was not only the greateſt that the Jews had ever yet received; but in ſome ſort even beyond itſelf. The high-ways where they march'd were all cover'd with dead bodies; the river Jordan ſo choaked with carcaſſes, that there was no croſſing it; and vaſt numbers floating down ſeveral chanels that led into the lake Aſphaltitis.

PLACIDUS being now in the train of his good fortune, reduced Abila, Julias, Beſemoth, and other places as far as the lake; where he ſettled gariſons of the beſt and truſtieſt men he could pick out of thoſe that came over to the Romans: his next work was to put his ſoldiers aboard, and clear the lake of all the fugitives that had fled thither for refuge; which he did ſo effectually, that the Romans were by this time abſolute maſters of all beyond Jordan, as far as Macherus.

Placidus reduces ſeveral places, and ſettles gariſons in them.

CHAP. IV.

Gaul revolts. Veſpaſian's marches and motions: He comes to Jericho. A deſcription of the place. The lakes of Aſphaltitis and Tiberias. Eliſha's fountain.

WHILE this paſs'd in Judea, there came news out of * Gaul of a revolt there from Nero; and that Vindex with ſeveral principal men of the country were the heads of it: but of this more particularly elſewhere. Veſpaſian, upon this intelligence, puſh'd on the preſent war with more and more vigour; for he did not know how many revolts might follow one upon the neck of another, and the whole empire come to be in danger at laſt by a civil war: whereas if the troubles in the eaſt were but firſt compos'd, Italy would have the leſs to fear. But winter not being a ſeaſon for it, all that could be done toward it at preſent, was only to gariſon the towns and cities he had ſubdu'd, erect proper officers in every city, and to order reparations where they were needful.

Gaul revolts;

THE firſt thing he did was to march with his army from Ceſarea to Antipatris; where he ſtay'd two days to ſettle affairs; and on the third he laid waſte with fire and ſword, all the borders of the toparchy of Thamna; from whence he march'd to Lydda and Jamnia. Theſe two places ſubmitted to him. And then, when he had peopled them with inhabitants from other towns, ſuch as he thought he might beſt confide in, he advanced to Ammaus; and poſſeſſing himſelf there of the paſſage that leads to the capital city, he pitch'd his camp and ran a wall about it: and leaving the fifth legion there, he mov'd with the reſt of his troops into the toparchy of Bethlepton; which he burnt and deſtroy'd, together with the neighbouring country and the borders of Idumea; ſaving only ſome ſtrong caſtles that he manned and fortify'd.

Veſpaſian's marches and motions.

THERE were two towns that he took in the middle of Idumea; Bethabri and Caphartoba; where he kill'd upward of ten thouſand men, reſerving near a thouſand for ſlaves; drove out the reſt of the people, and left a conſiderable part of his troops to ſally out, and commit outrages upon the mountains.

HE returned after this, with the remainder of his army, to † Ammaus; and paſſing from thence by Samaria, and Neopolis, (which the natives call Mabartha) he came the ſecond of the month ‡ Deſius to Corea, where he encamped, and ſhew'd himſelf next day before Jericho. At Jericho, Trajan, one of the chief officers, join'd him with the troops under his command, after the entire reduction of all beyond Jordan: But moſt of the inhabitants were withdrawn to the mountains over againſt Jeruſalem, before the arrival of the Romans; and a great part of thoſe that ſtay'd behind were put to the ſword.

VESPASIAN, in fine, found Jericho a deſolate and a forſaken city. It ſtands upon a plain that is overlooked by a naked and a barren mountain; and of ſuch an extent, that it reaches upon the north ſide to the region of Scythopolis; on the ſouth, as far as Sodom, and the borders of the lake Aſphaltitis; a country ſo wretchedly poor and barren, that Veſpaſian marches to Jericho.

A deſcription of the place.

* This revolt was headed by Caius Julius Vindex, lord lieutenant of that province. See Sueton. in Nero, c. 1.
† In the Latin verſion Jamnia.
‡ i. e. June.

'tis void of inhabitants. Over against this, and on the farther side of the river Jordan, there lies another mountain; which begins at Julias toward the north, and stretches southward up to Gomorrha, and so borders upon Petra, a city of Arabia. There is also another mountain which they call the Iron-mountain, and runs out as far as the land of the Moabites. Betwixt these mountains lies a place called the Great-plain: It begins at Gennabara, and stretches out to the lake Asphaltitis; the length of it is two hundred * and thirty furlongs; the breadth, an hundred and † twenty; and the river Jordan crosses the middle of it.

The great plain.

The lakes of Asphaltitis and Tiberias.

THERE are two remarkable lakes: the one call'd Asphaltitis, the other, the lake of Tiberias; but of very different, if not contrary qualities: the former being salt and without fish; but the other sweet, kindly and fruitful. The summer-heats there are intolerable; the country burnt up with them, and the air hot and sickly, without any refreshment but from the river Jordan; as appears by the palm-trees, which thrive much better upon the banks than at a distance.

AT or near to Jericho itself, there is a large and a plentiful fountain; which overflows all the grounds thereabouts, and takes its rise not far from an antient city; the first place that Jesus, ‡ the son of Nave, the famous general of the Hebrews, gain'd from the Chanaanites by the sword. There goes a tradition, that this fountain in time past was so dangerous, that it did not only corrupt the fruits of the earth, as well grain as plants, but likewise caused abortions in women, and tainted with a blasting infection whatever it touched, that was capable of such an impression.

Elisha's fountain cured by miracle II Kings II. 21.

But it says farther, that from the days of the prophet Elisha, the illustrious successor of Elias, the waters of this fountain became not only innocent, but nourishing and wholesome; and upon this occasion, Elisha having been treated with great hospitality and respect by the people of Jericho, bethought himself of such an acknowledgment, as they themselves, their country and posterity, might be the better for to the end of the world. The prophet, upon this, went out to the fountain; and causing a pitcher of salt to be let down into the bottom of it, he advanced his right hand toward heaven, and presenting his oblations at the side of it, "he besought God in his "goodness to correct the waters, and to "sweeten the veins that pass'd from them; to "soften the air, and make it temperate and "fructifying; to bestow children as well as "fruits upon the inhabitants in abundance, "and never to withdraw these blessings so "long as they continued in their duty." Upon the offering up of this prayer, with all due ceremony and according to form, the quality of the fountain was chang'd; and instead of sterility and famine, the waters were now become an efficacious means of plenty and encrease; insomuch that the bare touching of the ground with them gives every thing a more savoury relish: but let them lie never so long upon it, the effect is much the same; especially if it arises from any diffidence of the miracle. And over and above all this, there is not another river in the country that runs such a tract of ground.

A description of the country.

THE country it waters, is seventy § furlongs in length, and  twenty in breadth; furnish'd with curious gardens and thick groves in abundance; with palm-trees along the brooks, of different kinds, names, and tastes. They press out of some of them great quantities of a sort of honey not much inferior to other honey; which they have there also in great plenty. And then for balsam, which is the choicest fruit they have, there is great store of it; and so for †† Cyprus, and ‡‡ Myrobalanus: a blessing from heaven undoubtedly, for a country to produce not only the choicest fruits of the earth, but the largest and best of the several sorts. And they are not behind the happiest of all other countries neither for the production of other fruits, and for the improving of them as well in growth as in virtue. This may be ascrib'd, in my opinion, to some peculiar property and dispositon in the water, and to a certain kindly warmth in the air. The latter to draw out and diffuse the virtue of the subject matter it hath to work upon; as in the disclosing of leaves, flowers, and the like. The other serves to bind and confirm the roots, and to fortify them by increasing the sap against the parching rages; which are so furious in that country, that nothing would be able to sprout or bud without it. But yet in the extremity of these burning heats, they have likewise every morning such refreshing breezes, that the very breath of them makes the water that is drawn before sun-rise quite another thing. In the winter it is warm, and comfortable to bathe in. Such, in fine, is the temperature of the climate, that when it is frost and snow in other parts of Judea, the natives of this place go clad only in single linen. It lies an hundred §§ and fifty furlongs from Jerusalem, sixty  from the river Jordan, and the whole country betwixt that and Jerusalem is all rock and desart. It lies lower indeed betwixt this place and Jordan, and so to the lake Asphaltitis; but every jot as rude and barren as the other. This is enough said of the happy situation, and the natural advantages of Jericho.

Nothing ſinks in the lake of Aſphaltitis. Veſpaſian tries the experiment, and finds it ſo. Several wonderful qualities in this lake. It borders upon Sodom. A fair fruit there to the eye, but falls to nothing upon the touch.

Nothing ſinks in the lake of Aſphaltitis.

IT will become me now to ſay ſomething of the Aſphaltitis, and the nature of that lake. It is ſalt to the taſte, and no fiſh will live in it, nor hardly any thing ſink that is thrown into it, let it be never ſo heavy; ſo that a man would find it a hard matter to drown himſelf in this lake, tho' he had never ſo great a mind to it. Veſpaſian having heard of the ſtrange quality of this water, took a journey on purpoſe out of a curioſity to ſee it; and order'd ſeveral perſons that could not ſwim, to be caſt into it from above, with their hands ty'd behind them; and they all came up again, as if they had been rais'd by a puff of wind, and ſo floated on the ſurface of the water. There is a wonderful ſecret in this lake; which is, that it changes colour thrice a day, according to the various refractions of the light of the ſun-beams upon it: there are alſo to be ſeen in ſeveral parts of it, toſs'd up and down adrift, large lumps of a dark bituminous matter, not much unlike the bodies of bulls without heads. The people of the country fiſh them up in their boats; but the ſubſtance of them is ſo viſcous, and one part ſo glew'd to another, that there is no getting the veſſel off again, but by diſſolving the lumps, and ſeparating that part without the boat from the other within; which diſſolution is to be wrought by the means of urine and the menſtrua of a woman. This bituminous matter ſerves both for ſhipping, and for medicines; for it ſtops leaks, and cures many diſeaſes. The length of this lake * is five hundred and eighty furlongs, the breadth of it a † hundred and fifty, and it extends as far as Zoar in Arabia.

Veſpaſian makes the experiment, and finds it ſo.

Several wonderful ſecrets in this lake.

The lake borders upon Sodom.

IT borders upon the land of Sodom; a country once famous both for the wealth of its inhabitants, and for the fruitfulneſs of the ſoil: but at preſent it lies totally deſolate, having been deſtroy'd by a judgment of fire from heaven for the wickedneſs of the people. There are yet to be ſeen there ſome remains of the ruins of five abominable cities that periſh'd in that conflagration; and there are mock-fruits to be ſeen to this day ſpringing out of the aſhes, fair and lovely to the eye, but reſolving into ſmoke and aſhes upon the touch. So that we have not only tradition, but ocular teſtimony alſo, for the credit of this hiſtory.

A fair fruit to the eye, that falls to aſhes upon the touch.

Veſpaſian inveſts Jeruſalem. Geraſa taken by aſſault, and burnt. The news of Nero's death. The end of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. Veſpaſian ſuſpends his deſign upon Jeruſalem. All things are put to a ſtand.

Jeruſalem inveſted by Veſpaſian.

VESPASIAN, being reſolved to inveſt Jeruſalem on every ſide, raiſed two forts, at Jericho and Adida; putting into each of them gariſons both of auxiliaries and Romans. The general then ſent Lucius Annius with a body of horſe and foot to Geraſa; which he took by ſtorm upon the firſt attack. He put a thouſand young men to the ſword, whom he intercepted in their flight; carrying away whole families priſoners, and giving the ſoldiers the pillage: and this being done, he ſet fire to the place, and ſo went forward. The rich fled; thoſe that could not get away were cut to pieces; and whatever they took they burnt; nothing, in ſhort, eſcaped them, neither mountains nor valleys, places or people; but all ſuffered in the outrages of the war. As for thoſe that were ſhut up in Jeruſalem, there was no ſtirring out: the Zelotes keeping ſo ſtrict a watch upon thoſe that were friends to the Romans; and the town being ſo beſet by the enemy, that the Zelotes party durſt not venture, for fear of falling into their hands.

Geraſa taken by ſtorm, and put to fire and ſword.

WHEN Veſpaſian was now returned to Ceſarea, and preparing to advance with his whole army againſt Jeruſalem, news was brought him of the death of Nero; who had now reigned thirteen years and eight days. It is not my buſineſs to arraign his memory for the diſhonour he put upon the government, in ſuffering himſelf to be impoſed upon, and led like a child by Nymphidius and Tigillinus, two of the moſt ſcandalous varlets that he had about him; how he was betray'd by theſe infamous wretches, abandoned by his ſenators and guards, and being forced to fly for ſafety into the ſuburbs, only with four of his freemen (all that ſtood by him) how he there laid violent hands upon himſelf, and what became of thoſe in the concluſion that brought him to his end: what was the iſſue of the war with the Gauls; Galba's being declared emperor; and afterwards, upon his coming out of Spain to Rome, his being calumniated by the ſoldiery for a man of a mean ſpirit, and by them ſlain in the middle of the great market-place; how Otho was then created emperor, and then march'd with his army againſt Vitellius. This is all little or nothing to my purpoſe: neither is it worth my while to enlarge upon the troubles of Vitellius; the combat before the capitol; or how Antonius Primus, and Macianus, after they had ſlain Vitellius, defeated the German troops, and put an end to the civil war. I am the leſs particular upon theſe points, in regard that ſeveral famous hiſtorians, both latin and greek, have already done that work ſo accurately to my hand; ſo that I ſhall content myſelf with theſe ſhort touches, provided only that I do not break the order, and diſcontinue the thread of my hiſtory.

The news of Nero's death comes to Veſpaſian, on his march toward Jeruſalem.

The ends of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

VESPASIAN, upon this intelligence, put a ſtop at firſt to his expedition againſt Jeruſalem, 'till he might know what became of the government after the death of Nero; and finding the ſucceſſion ſettled upon Galba, he did not think it prudential to act in an affair of that quality without orders. So that he ſent his ſon Titus immediately away to Galba, both to congratulate his acceſſion to the government, and to receive his inſtructions and

But as they were upon their paſſage near Achaia, they were given to underſtand that Galba was ſlain, after a government of ſeven months and ſeven days; Otho ſucceeding him, who governed three months. This alteration did not hinder Agrippa from proſecuting his journey to Rome: but Titus, by a divine impulſe, ſailed from Achaia into Syria, and from thence very ſeaſonably got back to Ceſarea to his father.

The ſurprize of this extraordinary revolution put all things to ſuch a ſtand, that the very empire itſelf ſtaggered at it. There was no more talk now of enlarging the empire, when they were ready to fall into the utmoſt confuſion at home.

A new war in Jeruſalem upon this occaſion.

UPON this revolution, there broke out a new war in Jeruſalem. There was one Simon, the ſon of Gioras, a Geraſene born, and in the prime of his age, though a man of leſs policy and artifice than John, who was now in poſſeſſion of the city; but younger, and much ſuperior to him in ſtrength and hardineſs of body. He was ſo dangerous a perſon, that Ananus the high-prieſt drove him out of his government in the toparchy of Acrabatena, and made him fly to the thieves in Maſſada for refuge. They were ſo ſuſpicious of him at firſt, that they would not truſt him any farther than the firſt floor of the fortreſs, among the women he brought along with him; while the reſt of the people kept above. But upon farther acquaintance, and finding how fit he was for their turn, they conceived a better opinion of him; and entruſted him to command parties upon adventure, and to join the reſt of the troops in pillaging and depopulating the territory of Maſſada: he did all he could to excite them to greater things too; but nothing leſs than ſovereignty would ſerve his turn, though to no purpoſe, 'till the news was brought him of the death of Ananus. And immediately, upon the removal of that obſtacle, he took his courſe into the mountains, and iſſued out proclamations of liberty to all ſlaves, and rewards to all freemen, that would liſt themſelves in his party. This brought over to him a great many diſorderly and licentious people, and with that rabble he ſack'd and deſtroy'd the villages upon the hills; augmenting his numbers daily, 'till in the end he marched down directly to the plains, and kept the cities in awe where-ever he paſſed: ſo that Simon was no longer a captain of thieves and ſlaves; but a great many men of power and quality, upon the reputation of his valour and ſucceſſes, were come over into his intereſt; and the generality of the better ſort of the people made their applications to him, with the reſpect and reverence of ſubjects to their prince. He made ſeveral excurſions into the toparchy of Acrabatena and the greater Idumea; where he made choice of Nain, (a town that he himſelf had walled in and fortified) for his retreat. In the valley of Pharan he found many caverns fitted to his hand, and others that he enlarged, for granaries, ſtores, magazines, and places of ſtowage; in ſhort, for what he got by pillage and booty. By this proviſion of men and neceſſaries, every body gave it for granted, that his main deſign was upon Jeruſalem. The Zelotes were of the ſame opinion too; and finding it dangerous to let him go on ſtrengthening himſelf every day more and more, they made one bold puſh of it, to try how they might prevent him in the progreſs of his ambition, before it was too late. Upon this, they advanced in a full body to charge him at the head of his troops; who encounter'd them with great courage, made a conſiderable ſlaughter among them, and put the reſt to the rout.

Simon of Geraſa, an ill man, makes head againſt Ananus.

He is worſted and takes ſanctuary among the Sicarii in Maſſada.

They find him a man fit for their turn

Simon's way of conduct upon the death of Ananus.

He begins with Idumea.

Now Simon did not think himſelf ſtrong enough yet to beſiege Jeruſalem, but choſe rather to begin with the conqueſt of Idumea; to effect which, he march'd directly with twenty thouſand men toward the borders. Upon this appearance, the heads of the Idumeans quickly got an army together of near twenty five thouſand choice men; leaving alſo a competent number to ſecure the country againſt the excurſions of the cut-throats in Maſſada. The Idumeans waited for Simon upon the borders; where, upon his advance, the two bodies engaged, and the battle laſted from morning till night, upon terms ſo equal, that no body could ſay which of the two had the better: but they had both enough of it; for Simon drew off quietly to Nain, and the Idumeans return'd to their own home.

An obſtinate fight betwixt Simon and the Idumeans.

It was not long after this that Simon took the field again, with the reinforcement of a much ſtronger army; and encamping near the village of Thecue, he ſent Eleazar, one of his companions, with a ſummons to the governor of Herodion, requiring him to deliver the caſtle into his hands. The officers received him at firſt with all the niceties of military honour and reſpect; but upon coming to underſtand his commiſſion, they all drew upon him in that very inſtant; and Eleazar, finding it impoſſible to make an eſcape, leap'd down the precipice from the wall, where he was daſh'd to pieces.

Eleazar ſends a plauſible ſummons to Herodion, the gariſon receives him.

Eleazar detected, and caſts himſelf over the wall into the ditch.

THE Idumeans were poſſeſs'd with ſuch an apprehenſion of Simon's courage and power, that they had no mind to grapple with him, till they might firſt be perfectly well informed in the ſtate and ſtrength of his army. James, one of their commanders, very readily, and of his own accord (but with treachery in his heart) took upon himſelf the office of a informer. Upon this commiſſion he went away from Olurus, (where the Idumean army lay at that time encamp'd) and ſo to Simon. After ſome diſcourſe upon the buſineſs, he enter'd into a ſolemn contract with Simon to deliver up up his country into his hands, upon condition to be treated after the performance of it, as his firſt miniſter and favourite; undertaking in the next place, to make him maſter of all Idumea. When Simon had ſufficiently ſweetened this treacherous inſtrument, with a ſplendid treat, fair words, and large promiſes, he returned back again to his own people; where he made Simon twenty times more conſiderable than in truth he was, for ſtrength, conduct, number, order, and diſcipline: which, by little and little, made ſuch an impreſſion, not only upon the ignorant multitude, but upon the officers themſelves too, that they were all prevailed upon not to diſpute the matter any farther by arms, but rather to ſubmit all to Simon, for fear of worſe conſequences; James ſending away meſſengers to Simon at the ſame time to come away immediately, and not to loſe ſo fair an opportunity, for he would be anſwerable for it, that Idumea ſhould be his own without blood-ſhed; which he made good accordingly. Upon the approach of the army, James was the firſt man that took horſe, and ſpurr'd away, as in a fright, with the reſt of the faction at his heels. This ſtruck ſuch a terror into the hearts of the people, that they ran their ſeveral ways; and ſo diſpers'd upon it, that the whole army was diſſolved without ſo much as attempting a battle.

A panick fright, and Idumea taken without a ſtroke.

SIMON being now poſſeſſed of Idumea, without blood, which was little leſs than a miracle, he ſurpriz'd the town of Chebron; wherein he obtain'd ſtores of corn, and other booty to a prodigious value. This city is of great antiquity, and not only the eldeſt of the province, but, if we may believe the natives, ancienter than even the Egyptian Memphis itſelf; being computed to be of two thouſand three hundred years ſtanding. They have a tradition, that Abraham, the original father of the Jews, took up his habitation there, upon his leaving Meſopotamia; and that his poſterity remov'd from thence into Egypt; where there are monuments to be ſeen at this day, with marble inſcriptions curiouſly wrought, in confirmation of what I deliver. There is likewiſe to be ſeen, within ſix * furlongs of the place, a wonderful turpentine tree; which, according to the tradition of the place, was created with the world itſelf, and is yet ſound and firm.

Chebron ſurpriz'd. A deſcription of the place.

FROM this place Simon made his inroads quite through Idumea, accompany'd with a train of forty thouſand men, beſide his men of arms; deſtroying and depopulating, not only towns and villages, but whole territories and countries where-ever he came. The marching of his army was the ſame thing to the people, that a flight of locuſts are to a wood: they left behind them not ſo much as a leaf or a ſpire of graſs, nor any thing more than a deſart, where-ever they came. It was a thing utterly impoſſible to find proviſions for ſo many mouths; and then the natural fierceneſs of Simon, and the malicious animoſity of his rage againſt the Idumeans, was ſtill a farther aggravation of the pinching neceſſity. In fine, what with burning, demoliſhing, devouring the fruits of the earth, or trampling them to dirt, Simon's troops did not leave ſo much even in a fruitful well-cultivated country, as the leaſt ſign or memorial of what it had been formerly.

Idumea and the whole country about it laid waſte.

THE inhumanity of this proceeding incited the indignation of the Zelotes, though they durſt not bring it to an open war; but contented themſelves with attacking his party by ſurprize and out of ambuſcades, wherein it was their fortune at laſt to make a conſiderable purchaſe, as they accounted it: for they took Simon's wife priſoner, and ſeveral of his domeſticks and favourites, and carry'd her away to Jeruſalem, with as much joy and triumph, as if it had been the husband himſelf; making no doubt, but Simon would now lay down his arms, and compound for his wife. But this violence upon the woman, wrought, it ſeems, a quite contrary effect upon the huſband; and inſtead of moving him to tenderneſs and compaſſion, tranſported him into the furious extravagancies of a mad-man.

Simon's wife taken priſoner by the Zelotes.

HE went immediately to the gates of Jeruſalem; and there, like a wild beaſt that's wounded, and cannot come at the perſons that did it, he diſcharg'd his outrageous choler upon whatever came in his way; men, women, and children, that only went out of the town for ſticks and herbs, he cauſed to be taken up and whipt to death, young and old without diſtinction: only he was ſo merciful as not to eat their fleſh when he had killed them. He cut off the hands of a great many of them for a terror to his enemies, as well as to fright the people from their party, and ſent them to the town ſo maim'd, with theſe words in their mouths: "That Simon ſwore by the "great God, who governs the univerſe, if "they did not immediately return his wife "again, he would break down their walls, "and put every ſoul in the town to the ſame "extremity; whether they were young or "old, guilty or innocent." The dread of theſe menaces did not only work upon the multitude, but upon the Zelotes themſelves: inſomuch, that they reſtor'd him his wife upon it; and ſo far pacify'd his wrath, as to obtain ſome ſort of reſpite to his daily cruelties.

And upon thoſe menaces they ſend him his wife again.

better of it the firſt day; and Vitellius carry'd it the next, under the command of his two generals, Valens and Cecinna. There was a great ſlaughter; and Otho, who was then at Brixellum, upon the news of this defeat, ſtabb'd himſelf with a dagger, after a reign of three months and two days. Upon this change, Otho's ſoldiers went over to the party of Vitellius, who preſently march'd away with his army to Rome.

Veſpaſian propoſes to himſelf a thorough conqueſt of Judea.

VESPASIAN in the mean time remov'd from Ceſarea on the fifth of the month * Deſius, in a proſpect of making a thorough conqueſt of Judea, by reducing the remainder of it that yet ſtood out: he began among the mountains, and made himſelf maſter of the toparchies of Gophnis and Acrabatena; poſſeſſing himſelf afterwards of the cities of Bethel and Ephraim; where he ſettled gariſons. His next remove was toward Jeruſalem; where he took and kill'd vaſt numbers of Jews by the way.

Cerealis takes Capharis.

CEREALIS, in the mean time, one of the principal officers, with a body of horſe and foot, over-ran the upper Idumea; took and burnt the caſtle Caphetra by the way; laid ſiege to Capharis, a ſtrong wall'd town; and they were in hope it would have made a good defence: but, beyond all expectation, the townſmen open'd their gates, threw themſelves at their feet, and ſo gave it up. Having thus carry'd every thing before him, he went to Chebron (the ancient town upon the mountains, formerly ſpoken of, not far from Jeruſalem) which he attack'd and carry'd at the firſt aſſault. He put all the people in it to the ſword; ſack'd and burnt the city. There were yet three caſtles in the poſſeſſion of the cut-throat faction; Herodion, Maſſada and Macherus: and Veſpaſian wanted nothing after this, to put a final end to this terrible war, but the taking of Jeruſalem.

Lays Chebron in aſhes; and nothing wanting but Jeruſalem to put an end to the war.

John caſt off; and Simon invited into the government: where he is welcom'd with ſhouts and acclamations. An aſſault upon the temple.*

Simon takes his revenge of the Idumeans for his wife

WHEN Simon had got his wife again from the Zelotes, he wreak'd the bitterneſs of his malice upon the remainder of the Idumeans; and perſecuted them ſo bloodily with haraſing and hunting them up and down, that divers of them in a deſperation, fled to Jeruſalem for ſanctuary: Simon purſuing them to the very foot of the wall, and killing all comers and goers that came within his reach.

Simon worſe without the town than the Romans, and the Zelotes worſt of all. The brutal and inhuman luſts and liberties of the Zelotes

So that Simon without the town was a worſe enemy than the Romans; and the Zelotes within, worſe than both. But the Galileans all this while taught them their leſſon, and improv'd them in all the arts of wickedneſs, by inſtruction, encouragement, and example. Now John being their creature, thought it but reaſonable to employ the power they had procured him to the ſatisfaction of his patrons; and ſo left them at liberty to live without controul according to the dictates of their own licentious luſts. In the matter of rapine and pillage, their avarice was inſatiable. They made no more of taking away the lives of men, and the honour of women, than of a common frolick or diverſion: and when they had ſated themſelves with blood and oppreſſion, they went on wallowing in the brutality of their carnal appetites: powdering and curling their hair; diſguiſed in the dreſs and habit of women; painting, and ſetting themſelves off with dawbs and waſhes. Nor did they imitate women only in their clothes and ornaments, but in their impudence alſo; for they converſed with no more reſtraint in the face of the ſun, than they would have done in a common ſtews: preſſing and practiſing unnatural luſts, and polluting the whole city with impurities not to be nam'd, or ſo much as thought off. But all this while, with the faces and impudence of women, they had the hearts and hands of cut-throats: and how effeminate and mincing ſoever they were in their gate and motions, they had yet their martial weapons about them, and their ſwords out in a trice, upon any ſudden occaſion, to kill the next man they met. He that eſcap'd John, fell into the hands of Simon, the bloodier monſter of the two; and he that got clear of the domeſtick tyrant, was deſtroy'd by the other before the town: beſide that all the paſſages were ſo blockt up, that there was no coming off for thoſe that had a mind to go over to the Romans.

No eſcaping.

The Idumeans revolt; and rout the Zelotes.

Purſuing them to the palace, and ſo to the temple.

BETWIXT the envy of John's power and the deteſtation of his barbarous cruelties, the eyes of the Idumeans were by this time open'd; for they brake out into a direct revolt, and made head againſt him. It came to a battle, and a great many of the Zelotes were ſlain upon the ſpot; the reſt fled into the palace royal, which was originally erected by one Grapte, a kinſwoman of Izates the king of the Adiabenians. The Idumeans puſh'd in along with them; and ſo beating the Zelotes into the temple, they made themſelves maſters of the whole maſs of John's treaſure for a booty; which was there depoſited under the roof of his own habitation. The Zelotes up and down the town gather'd together upon this, to join thoſe of their companions that were got into the temple; and John immediately put himſelf in a poſture for a ſally upon the Idumeans and the citizens: not that they had any apprehenſion of their number, for they were too many for them; but for fear of their ſtealing out of the city by night, and at the ſame time cutting of throats and ſetting fire to't. Upon this occaſion they call'd a council, and deliberated with the high-prieſt what meaſures they were to take. But it pleas'd God to infatuate their policies, by giving them over to a remedy worſe than the diſeaſe; for they reſolv'd among themſelves to caſt off John, and to ſet up Simon in his ſtead: and in ſo doing they did but clear their hands of one tyrant, and lay themſelves at the feet of another. But the vote paſs'd however, and Matthias the high-prieſt was ſent to invite Simon into the town for their governor, whom

John caſt off, and Simon invited to the government.

they had been ſo often in dread of. There were divers others alſo that had been forced out of Jeruſalem by the Zelotes, and would gladly have been at home again, that join'd with Matthias in the ſame requeſt. Simon gave them a magiſterial anſwer that their petition was granted; and ſo enter'd the city in the quality of their preſerver; the people receiving him alſo with acclamations in the ſame ſtile and character. This happen'd in the third month that, they call * Xanthicus. Simon had no ſooner enter'd Jeruſalem with his troops, but his head was preſently at work how to ſettle himſelf; for he look'd upon thoſe that call'd him in, and thoſe againſt whom he was call'd, to be equally his enemies.

Simon receiv'd into the city with ſhouts and acclamations.

WHEN John found himſelf coop'd up in the temple with the reſt of the Zelotes, and that Simon and his companions had made a thorough riffle of the city, he gave himſelf for loſt. The latter, in the mean time, led on the common people to an aſſault upon the temple; but the beſiegers were ſo gall'd with ſtones, darts, and arrows, from the galleries and battlements over head, that they were driven back with great loſs; ſeveral kill'd, others carry'd off wounded, and upon the whole a general diſappointment; the Zelotes having gotten the advantage of the ground, where there was no coming at them: beſide four ſtrong large towers of their own erecting to annoy the enemy from above: one to the eaſtward, another to the north; a third upon a gallery at the corner over againſt the lower town, and a fourth upon the top of what they call the † Paſtophoria; a place where formerly the prieſt uſed to ſtand after noon, to make proclamation by ſound of trumpet when the ſabbath began, and when it ended: and ſo to the people in like manner, when they were to work, and when to keep holiday. In theſe turrets they had diſpos'd of their archers, ſlingers, and engineers, with arrows, ſtones, and all their military proviſions about them. Simon and his men were not a little ſurpriz'd at this obſtinate reſiſtance of the Zelotes; but depending upon their numbers, they preſs'd forward ſtill; though with the loſs of a great many men from the Zelotes ſlings and machines.

A civil war in Rome; and Vitellius at the head of a vaſt army there. The news of Vitellius being choſen emperor goes to the heart of Veſpaſian. An invective againſt Vitellius and his party, to the honour of Veſpaſian and Titus. The ſoldiers are bent upon a change; and Veſpaſian takes the army into his care.

A civil war in Rome; and Vitellius there with a vaſt army.

IN the very heat of theſe broils in Jeruſalem, there brake out a worſe miſchief in Rome itſelf: that is to ſay, a civil war. Vitellius was now come out of Germany, attended with ſuch a prodigious multitude of foreign troops, that for want of room in the lodgments that were aſſign'd them, they were fain to take up in private houſes, and to turn the whole city into one general quarter. The ſparkling of the Romans gold and ſilver, and the ſight of their riches, was ſuch a temptation to ſtrangers unaccuſtomed to ſuch ſights, that they could hardly reſtrain themſelves, either from taking things by force, or killing thoſe that hinder'd them. This was the condition of Italy at that time.

UPON Veſpaſian's return to Ceſarea, after laying waſte all about Jeruſalem, the news was brought him of ſtrange tumults in Rome, and that Vitellius was declar'd emperor. Now though Veſpaſian was a man of order, and knew as well how to obey as to command, yet he could not brook to think of owning that man for his maſter, who came to the empire as to a prey rather than to a dignity. This wonderful turn was ſo great a mortification and diſtraction to him, that he could not ſo much as think of any foreign wars, at a time when his country lay labouring under ſuch miſerable circumſtances at home. But as his indignation ſpurr'd him on to a revenge on the one hand; ſo the difficulties of ſo long a journey in order to the execution of it (eſpecially in winter too) put a check to him on the other: for many ſtrange things might fall out for ought he knew before he could reach Italy. Theſe, and ſuch thoughts as theſe, brought him by degrees to himſelf again. While this was in agitation, the officers and ſoldiers drew into clubs and cabals, in parties; and ſo diſcourſing freely upon matters of ſtate and government, they did not ſcruple to declare their opinions for another change; loudly exclaiming againſt the Roman ſoldiers. "A company of diſſolute effeminate wretches (they cry'd!) that would not ſtand ſo much as "the noiſe of a war! Theſe were pretty fellows indeed, they ſaid, to diſpoſe of empires; or in truth, rather to ſell them to the "faireſt bidder. Can they ever think that "we, after the fatigues of ſo much duty and "hard labour, till we are grown old under "our arms; —— that we, will ever ſubmit to an emperor of their chuſing, when "we have ſo much a worthier prince of our "own? over and above, that if we loſe this "opportunity of expreſſing our gratitude for "the generous obligations Veſpaſian hath laid "upon us, 'tis odds we ſhall never have the "like again. Beſide that Veſpaſian is in himſelf as much ſuperior to Vitellius, with reſpect to the character of an emperor, as we "ourſelves are to thoſe that made him one. "Have not we run as many riſques, and born "as great a part in the war, as the German "legion that brought this uſurper into the "capital city? are not we as well ſkill'd in "the art and diſcipline of war as they? Now "for Veſpaſian, there can be no diſpute or "competition; for the ſenate and the people "of Rome are all for him, and will never "endure the licentious debauches of Vitellius "to be put in the balance againſt the modeſty "and temperance of Veſpaſian; which would "be the exchanging of a gracious prince for "a mercileſs tyrant. ‡ Nor is it to be ex-"pected that the ſon Titus, though a prince "of extraordinary virtue, ſhould be choſen "in preference to his father. But let it ſuf-

" Now if either maturity of experience, or " vigour of youth, may intitle a prince to the " choice, you have the one in Veſpaſian, and " the other in Titus; and all the advantages " that attend wiſdom, force and reſolution. " It is further to be conſider'd, that in electing " the admirable father of this incomparable " ſon, the three imperial legions and auxilia- " ries will be enforced with the whole power " of the eaſt, that part of Europe that lies out " of the reach of Vitellius, and all the in- " tereſt that Veſpaſian's friends, his brother, " and his other ſon can make in Italy: the one " being prefect * of Rome, a charge of great " influence and credit, eſpecially at the be- " ginning of a reign; and the other ſo popu- " lar, that which way ſoever he went, the " flower of the nobility would be ſure to ſide " with him. But now after all, they cry'd, " what if the ſenate itſelf ſhould put up Veſ- " paſian for emperor, and take the glory and " the merit of the action out of our hands; " while we ſtand upon forms and niceties to " no manner of purpoſe; ſhould not we be " finely deceiv'd then? we, that of all men " living have the greateſt obligation to " him."

The army preſſes Veſpaſian to take them into his protection: which with much ado they obtain'd.

THIS was the ſoldiers talk among themſelves, at firſt only in knots and corners: but their confidence increaſing with their numbers, they came unanimouſly to the point, and one and all cry'd up Veſpaſian, emperor; begging him at the ſame time to take the tottering empire into his protection. This great man had been a long time the ſupporter of the empire; but for the ſtile of emperor, he abſolutely refus'd it, (though in that very refuſal he deſerv'd it) declaring that he had much rather ſpend the remainder of his days in the freedom of a private life, than among the ſnares and difficulties of a more illuſtrious and exalted ſtation. The more Veſpaſian declin'd it, the more the officers preſs'd him; till at length, upon his obſtinate denial, they came all up to him with their † ſwords drawn, and threaten'd to kill him, unleſs he would ſubmit to accept of the honour that he deſerv'd. He refuſed it a long time; but in the end, when he ſaw they would not be deny'd, he yielded to their importunity.

Mucianus preſſes Veſpaſian to march againſt Vitellius; but Veſpaſian is rather for Alexandria. Of Egypt and the ſituation of it. Alexandria a dangerous port. The tower of Pharos. Tiberius Alexander a true friend to Veſpaſian.

VESPASIAN was no ſooner advanced to the empire, but Mucianus and the reſt of the officers that invited him to government, with the whole army, called out with one voice to march againſt Vitellius; but Veſpaſian was rather of opinion for beginning with Alexandria; Egypt being one of the moſt neceſſary and conſiderable branches of the empire, in reſpect of the vaſt quantities of corn it produces: inſomuch that if he could but make himſelf maſter of that country, he was in hope that Rome itſelf would rather turn out Vitellius than run the hazard, if they ſtood it out, of ſtarving for his ſake, as of neceſſity they muſt without relief from Egypt. He deſired alſo an enforcement of two legions that lay at Alexandria to join him.

Mucianus urges Veſpaſian to march with his army againſt Vitellius. Veſpaſian is rather for Alexandria; and gives his reaſons for it.

HE propounded alſo the making of the province a ſecure place of retreat in the worſt of fortunes. There is hardly any coming at it by land, and no ports to the ſea. It is bounded on the weſt with the parching land of Libya: on the ſouth, Syene divides it from Ethiopia, and the unpaſſable cataracts of the river Nile: on the eaſt, the Red-ſea ſerves it for a rampart as far as the city Coptos; and on the north, it ſtretches out as far as Syria, and that which they call the Egyptian-ſea, and the coaſt quite thorough wholly deſtitute of ports: ſo that nature hath provided for the ſecurity of Egypt in the very ſituation of it. From Peluſium to Syene they reckon two thouſand ‡ furlongs, and three § thouſand ſix hundred by ſea, from Plinthine to Peluſium. The Nile is navigable as far as Elephantine; but, as I ſaid before, there is no paſſing further for the cataracts.

Of Egypt and the ſituation of it.

ALEXANDRIA, let the weather be never ſo fair, is a nice and a dangerous port; the entrance very narrow, and the rocks ſo ſcatter'd up and down in ſhallow water, that he muſt be a very exact guide that knows all the turnings. On the left hand it is encompaſs'd with a dike, like an arm about it; on the right lies the iſle of Pharos, which hath been ſo celebrated for a famous ſea-mark. The light of it is ſeen three  hundred furlongs off at ſea, and ſerves for a direction to mariners what courſe they are to ſteer. About this iſland there are mighty defences of ſtrong keys and thick walls, to break the violence of the waves that beat upon that quarter; and the rage of the billows daſhing one upon another makes the paſſage yet more hazardous. But after all theſe difficulties in the way, there is not a ſafer port in nature when you are once over the bar. The length of it is thirty †† furlongs, and it is furniſhed with conveniencies of ſtorehouſes for all manner of goods, to be either imported or exported.

Alexandria a dangerous port.

Vespasian's advancement pleases all people. He ascribes all his successes to providence. Several presages of his future greatness. Joseph treated Vespasian in the stile of emperor, even while Nero was yet living, and himself a prisoner; for which Vespasian gives him his liberty with honours and rewards.

The news of Vespasian's advancement gives an universal satisfaction.

THE news flew like lightning every where up and down the east of Vespasian's being advanced to the empire; and it was so welcome wherever it came, that all the cities made holiday upon the arrival of it, with vows and sacrifices for Vespasian's happy reign.

THE legions that were quarter'd in † Mesia and Pannonia, and were lately up in arms against Vitellius, for his tyrannical insolence, took the oath to Vespasian with all the chearfulness in the world.

UPON Vespasian's return from Cesarea to Berytus, there were several embassadors from Syria and other provinces that met him upon the way, with garlands and gratulatory addresses in the name of the cities and people: Mucianus the governor of Syria among the rest, with assurances of the faith and good affection of all in general; express'd by oaths and otherwise, to the person and authority of Vespasian.

Vespasian ascribes his successes to providence. A prophetical hint of Vespasian's future greatness.

Now Vespasian being so fortunate in all his undertakings, that whatever he did, succeeded to his wish, he began to bethink himself, that such a concurrence of seeming accidents making for him, look'd liker a providential disposition of things in the order of causes and effects, than the work of chance; and that it was the hand of God, not fortune, that had exalted him to that eminence. He then began to recollect what strange prophetical hints and prognosticks he had observ'd in the course of his life; and all pointing to the same end, as particularly a passage of Joseph's, who had the confidence in the very life of Nero, to give Vespasian the title of emperor. This remarkable prediction made such an impression upon Vespasian, (especially from a person that was yet his prisoner) that calling Mucianus and several of his friends and officers about him, he took occasion to make mention of the bravery of Joseph, and how resolutely he had opposed them at the siege of Jotapata; and so from one thing to another till he came to recount his predictions; which, says Vespasian, I took to be only the inventions of fear to screen himself from punishment; till time and the event of things have now made it evident that they were inspirations. "And, what a shame is "it for me now, (says Vespasian) to treat a "minister and the messenger of God that "brought me the tidings of my preferment, at "the scandalous rate still of a prisoner?"

Joseph treated Vespasian in the stile of emperor while Nero was yet living, and himself a prisoner.

HE had no sooner pass'd this reflection, but Joseph was immediately sent for, and set at liberty: from which generous gratitude his officers took their measures what they themselves might expect from so gracious a master, that were his faithful friends and servants. Titus being then present, told his father with submission, that in barely setting Joseph at liberty, the work was but half done; for his chains ought to be broken as well as taken off, to pronounce him an innocent, and to leave him as he found him; according to common practice when men are wrongfully imprison'd: for otherwise he is only discharg'd of the bondage, but the dishonour sticks upon him still. Vespasian concurr'd with him in opinion, and accordingly order'd his chains immediately to be cut to pieces with an ax. So that Joseph did not only get his freedom, but the reputation of a great prophet also for what he had foretold; and credit enough to be farther believ'd in whatever he should say for the future.

Vespasian sets Joseph at liberty for it with remarkable honours and rewards.

Vespasian quits the thought of Alexandria, and takes Antioch in his way to Rome. He sends Mucianus into Italy with an army.

WHEN Vespasian had given the embassadors their answers, and settled all his governments in the hands of fit and careful officers, he chang'd his mind, and went to Antioch; and so forward to Rome, rather than Alexandria, as he thought to have done; the latter being safe and quiet, and the other miserably embroil'd by Vitellius, and standing in more need of him of the two. So he sent Mucianus over land into Italy with an army of horse and foot, by the way of Cappadocia and Phrygia; for he durst not venture his troops upon a winter sea.

AMONG others there was ‡ Antonius Primus, the governor of Mesia, with the third legion that lay in that province; who desir'd nothing more than to come to an encounter with Vitellius. And so Vitellius, on the other hand, sent Cecinna at the head of a strong army against him. As he was upon his march for Rome, he met Anthony upon the borders of Italy not far from Cremona; where he ſtopp'd to gaze upon the numbers, the order and the diſcipline of the enemy; but durſt not engage them. He was now at a nonplus what to do. Fight he durſt not, and he could not run away with honour: ſo that he choſe the part of a deſerter rather than of a coward. He call'd his centurions, tribunes, and in ſhort, all his officers together, and made uſe of that occaſion to enter into a deſcant upon Veſpaſian and Vitellius, ſtill derogating from the latter, and elevating the former; with a deſign all this while to draw Vitellius's people over to Veſpaſian. "The former, he ſaid, had but the "name of an emperor; the other, the right "and authority, and the true ſtamp of an im-"perial character in his very perſon, over and "above the odds of Veſpaſian's choice of men "and numbers; to ſuch a degree, in fine, "that there was no contending with him. "And if it be ſo, ſays he, why ſhould not we "now do the ſame thing before-hand, by "choice, that we ſhall be forc'd to do but "the next hour by neceſſity? Not but that "Veſpaſian is able to do his buſineſs, to all "manner of purpoſes, without your help: "whereas Vitellius is not able to ſtand upon "his own legs, or to protect any party that "adheres to him." Cecinna ply'd his argument ſo far, till he gain'd his point, and carry'd the ſoldiers over to Anthony. But the next night, Cecinna's men, betwixt repentance for what they had done, and for fear of puniſhment in caſe Vitellius ſhould get the better of it, came in a rage with their ſwords drawn up to Cecinna to kill him; and they had certainly done it, if the tribunes had not paſſionately interpos'd on his behalf. So that they ſpar'd his life; but however order'd him to be kept in chains, and ſent away to Vitellius for a traytor. So ſoon as this came to Anthony's ear, he preſently commanded out a party to fall upon them as deſerters. They made a ſhort ſtand; but after the firſt ſhock, they gave ground, and took their flight toward Cremona. But Anthony put in with his horſe betwixt them and the town; and begirting them a-round, made a great ſlaughter upon the place, and gave the ſoldiers the pillage of the town. There periſh'd promiſcuouſly in this ravage foreign merchants and townſmen in abundance; with the whole army of Vitellius, to the number of thirty thouſand and two hundred perſons. There fell of Anthony's men that he brought out of Meſia, four thouſand five hundred; who ſetting Cecinna at liberty, ſent him away to Veſpaſian with the news of the victory; where he was receiv'd with great and unexpected honours to balance the diſgrace of being falſe to his maſter.

WHEN Sabinus, Veſpaſian's brother, underſtood that Anthony was upon his march toward Rome, it put new life into him; ſo that drawing together the city guards, that night he ſeiz'd the capitol: great numbers of perſons of the firſt quality coming in to them the next day; and among the reſt his nephew Domitian, who had a great hand in the glory of that action.

Sibinus ſeizes the capitol.

VITELLIUS never troubled his head about Anthony, but his main ſpite was at Sabinus, and the reſt that join'd with him in the revolt: and being naturally ſanguinary and cruel, eſpecially where there was noble blood in the caſe, he ſent a body of his own troops to attack the capitol; and there was great bravery ſhew'd betwixt them and thoſe in the temple; but in the end, the Germans, overpowering their adverſaries with numbers, gain'd the hill. Domitian and ſeveral Romans of the higheſt quality eſcap'd in a manner by miracle; but Sabinus was carry'd to Vitellius, who order'd him immediately to be put to death, and all the reſt were cut to pieces; the ſoldiers ſeizing the plunder of the temple, and then ſetting fire to it.

ANTHONY came up the next day with his army, and the Vitellians gave him battle. They fought in three ſeveral parts of the city, and were all ſlain. After this, came Vitellius out of his palace, wallowing drunk (according to his cuſtom) and overcharg'd with a gluttonous exceſs, where he was taken up and dragg'd through the ſtreets, villify'd with all ſorts of ſcurrilous and opprobrious language, and in the concluſion, ſtabb'd to death in the middle of the city. He had now reign'd eight months and five days; and ſuch was his profuſion, that if he had liv'd longer, the revenue of the empire would not have anſwer'd the charge of his debauches. They reckon upon upward of fifty thouſand men ſlain, over and above thoſe already mention'd: and this great action happened upon the third day of the ‡ month Apellæus.

A bloody battle. Vitellius dragg'd thro' the ſtreets drunk, and ſtabb'd to death in the city.

MUCIANUS next day enter'd Rome with his army, and after ſome ſort of ſtop put to the mercileſs rage of Anthony's ſoldiers (who were ſtill ſearching in all corners up and down for Vitellius's men, whom they kill'd as faſt as they found them, without ſo much as examining whether they were guilty or innocent) intimated to the people that they ſhould do well to chuſe Domitian for their governor till his father came up. But the people being now out of danger, and nothing farther to fear, would not hear of any other governor than Veſpaſian; and ſo crying him up to the skies with acclamations, they made a double feſtival of it; one, for the bleſſing of Veſpaſian's coming to the government, the other, for their deliverance from the tyranny of Vitellius.

The people declare every where for Veſpaſian.

Alexandria is look'd upon as one of the largeſt cities in the world, next to Rome itſelf; and yet upon this occaſion it was too little for the company. The imperial ſtate of Rome being now ſettled and ſecur'd, the people quiet and eaſy, beyond all expectation, and the winter over, Veſpaſian began to bethink himſelf of looking toward the remainder of Judea, and prepare for his journey to Rome. When he had put every thing in order in Alexandria, he ſent away his ſon Titus with his beſt troops, upon an expedition againſt Jeruſalem. ### CHAP. I.

Three factions in Jeruſalem. Eleazar began the breach, by ſetting up the Zelotes againſt the people. John of Giſchala puts in for himſelf. A fight betwixt John and Eleazar. An encounter betwixt John and Simon. The deplorable ſtate of Jeruſalem, that has neither humanity left in it, nor conſcience. The march and order of Titus's army.

WHEN Titus had paſs'd the deſarts betwixt Egypt and Syria, in ſuch manner as is already ſet forth, he came to Ceſarea; with a reſolution to draw his troops together there, and to form his army. While he was, as yet with his father Veſpaſian at Alexandria, giving orders about the adminiſtration of the empire which God had put into his hands, the factions in Jeruſalem were divided into three parties, and each againſt the other; which for an ill matter, was well enough to ſee a common enemy doing juſtice upon itſelf. As for the domineering faction of the Zelotes (whoſe inſolence was certainly the ruin of the city) we have ſpoken both of the riſe and encreaſe of it very particularly elſewhere; and it was no more, in ſhort, than one ſedition bred out of another. It had ſomewhat in it of the rage of a wild beaſt, that for want of other matter to work upon, preys upon its own bowels, rather than not be doing ſome miſchief or other.

Three factions in Jeruſalem.

ELEAZAR the ſon of Simon was the firſt that began the ſeparation in the temple, by ſetting up the Zelotes againſt the people, upon the preſence of being wonderfully offended at the daily inſolencies of John of Giſchala, but at the ſame time doing the ſame cruel things himſelf; and in truth, the main exception was no more than this: that the greater tyrant of the two could not brook to ſubmit to the leſs: ſo that betwixt an inſatiable thirſt after power, and an ambitious impatience of having any body above him; he fell off from his companions and ſet up for himſelf, with Judas the ſon of Chelcias, and Simon the ſon of Ezron; two perſons of great quality and intereſt; and likewiſe with Ezechias the ſon of Chobar, a man nobly deſcended; and every one of them at the head of a train of Zelotes. With this party they took poſſeſſion of the inner temple, and put guards upon the ſacred porches and doors, in confidence that the proviſions of the place, by reaſon of the multitude of their daily oblations, would ſupply them with all neceſſaries; and putting no difference, in fine, as to the common uſe of things, betwixt ſacred and prophane. Being thus poſted, the only thing they fear'd was want of men for the execution of any conſiderable deſign. John was much the ſtronger of the two; but what Eleazar wanted in number, was abundantly made good to him by the advantage of the place, for he had his enemy under him. Now John could not attempt any thing upon him but to his loſs; ſo that betwixt the fear of doing a raſh thing on the one hand, and the impatience of ſtanding ſtill to do nothing at all on the other, he was not a little divided how to behave himſelf. But his ſtomach and animoſity mosity carry'd it in the end however from his discretion; and he made several attacks, both with darts and other weapons of that nature, till the temple was polluted with the gore of dead bodies.

ON the other side, Simon the son of Gioras, whom the people in their distress had invited and entertained for their governor and protector, having in his possession the upper town, and the greater part of the lower, carry'd on the assault againſt John and his party with the greater vigour, when he saw how he was press'd at the same time from above by Eleazar. But John had the same advantage of Simon that Eleazar had of John, who effectually had a double war upon him, and as much the better of the one, as the worse of the other: for just so much as Eleazar was too hard for John, whom he had under him; so much was he too hard for Simon, who was below him again. So that John had little or no difficulty to repulse the attempts of Simon from the lower ground; as he defended himself the best he could from Eleazar that was over his head, with slings and machines to cast darts and stones. And these engines did execution not only upon the people in arms, but upon those also that came out of devotion to worship. For it must be acknowledg'd that these miscreants, even in the outrage of their impieties, gave admittance to all that offer'd themselves upon the account of religion; saving only that the Jews were most expos'd to strict searches and examinations. And for the strangers that were so happy as to escape the malice of a military fury, they fell here and there by casualty and mischance: that is to say, by the random shot of stones and lances, that reach'd the very altar, and cut off the sacrificers themselves in the exercise of their holy function, together with a multitude of common worshippers. Some that came from all quarters of the earth out of devotion to worship in this holy place, fell themselves the sacrifices, and defiled that altar with their blood, that not only the Greeks, but even the wildest of Barbarians had a veneration for. The dead bodies of strangers and of natives, persons holy and profane, were here promiscuously confounded, and their blood flowing up to the very altar.

An encounter between John and Simon.

The temple polluted with blood.

AH, miserable, miserable city! the fire and sword of the Romans, when they enter'd thee by force, and endeavour'd the purging of thee by flames for the iniquities of thy faction and apostacy, with all the desolation that ensu'd upon it; all this, I say, was nothing to the misery of thy present case. Thou wert no longer the seat of God, after turning his holy house, by thy civil broils, into a shambles or a common charnel-house; nor could'st thou ever expect to come off unpunish'd for these impious provocations. But it is not yet impossible; not impossible, I say, by a true repentance to appease the incensed justice of a righteous God, that laid this heavy judgment upon thee. But this were better let alone; for private passions and complaints are not the business of an historian, so that I shall return to my subject, and proceed to the matter of fact that follow'd upon this uproar.

JERUSALEM (as I have said already) was divided into three factions. Eleazar and his party, that had the charge of the first fruits and oblations, got drunk and fell upon John. John sally'd out upon Simon, and the people that assisted him with provisions, against himself and Eleazar. When John happen'd to be attack'd at the same time by Eleazar and Simon, both together, he divided his forces, and held those in play that assaulted him on the city-side, with darts from the tops of the porches, plying those in the temple above him with stones and arrows from his machines. When at any time his enemies over head gave him a little respite (as they did frequently, when Eleazar and his people were either tir'd or drunk) he was then at liberty to make stronger sallies upon Simon and his complices; and still as he beat him further and further into the town, he burnt all before him: magazines, granaries, stores, and all houses indifferently, with whatever was in them, that stood in his way. Upon his retreat, Simon follow'd him immediately; and then it was his turn to do the same thing over again. They could have done no more if they had been in a direct conspiracy for the betraying of Jerusalem to the Romans, by putting it out of condition of defence, in destroying all that was necessary to preserve it. And to increase the calamity, every thing was burnt to the ground quite round the temple; the city turn'd into a desart by the very natives of the place, and a field of battle one against another. The provision of corn, in fine, and other necessaries, sufficient to have maintain'd a siege for several years, was almost totally consum'd; which led inevitably to a famine, and the ruin of the city that they brought upon themselves.

John stands a double attack

Corn and other necessaries for life, burnt and destroy'd.

JERUSALEM in the mean time, betwixt the faction within the town, and the besiegers without, was like a great body worry'd and torn to pieces for a prey. Old men and women were under such an astonishment for what they saw and suffer'd, that they pray'd for the success of their very enemies, the Romans, and for a foreign war in exchange for a civil. They lay under the impression of a most scandalous dread and terror. It was now past advising time, and there was no place left either for repentance, composition, or flight; all passages were guarded, and the heads of the factions, how mortal enemies soever in other cases, were all of a mind yet in the agreement of killing any man that deserv'd to live. They suffer'd not one man to escape, that was but suspected to be a well willer to the Romans; but they were all treated like common enemies. Shouts, and the clashing of arms were heard day and night. The fear itself of evils to come was a great misery: but then the sense of those evils being come upon them was a much greater, and their daily lamentations were never yet without a just ground to work upon. Their fears made them smother their sorrows. Grief is dumb when it comes to be stupifying; and that is the tormenting affliction that lies gnawing, like a canker, at the heart, without making any noise. There was no such thing left as reverence for the living. The relation was lost betwixt superior and inferior, and as little regard had to the humanity of burying the dead. And what was the reason of all this, but an universal desperation; for he that hath nothing to hope for, hath nothing to fear. Every man that was not of the faction, gave himself for lost, and carry'd his life in his hand, as if he were the next moment to die. The faction all this while fought on, with heaps of carcaſſes under their feet, in a kind of triumphant vanity of oſtentation, as if the horror of the ſpectacle had made the living as hard and inſenſible as the dead. But their heads and their hearts were bent upon wickedneſs; and whatever came into their thoughts that they were able to compaſs, let it be never ſo bloody and cruel, they made no ſcruple to execute it. Witneſs John's perverting to profane uſes thoſe ſacred materials that were ſet apart for the ſervice of God's houſe. The people and high prieſts had once enter'd into a reſolution to raiſe the temple twenty *cubits higher, and to carry up an arch to ſupport the work. To this end king Agrippa, with incredible charge and labour, brought from mount Libanus, certain admirable pieces of timber, both for length and ſize: but the war breaking out, interrupted the deſign. So that John, having occaſion for the materials, had the trees cut out into lengths for his own proper uſe, and then fram'd into turrets for his ſecurity and defence againſt Eleazar and his party, who annoy'd him from the top of the temple. They were raiſed along the wall to the weſtward, over-againſt the great hall, as the only place capable of ſuch a ſtructure, by reaſon of ſo many ſtair-caſes in the way. John flatter'd himſelf that this impious contrivance of his would have laid his enemies at his feet: but God in his providence diſappointed him, by bringing the Romans in upon him, before he could perfect his work.

The march and order of Titus's army.

When Titus had gotten together one part of his army, and order'd the remainder of it up to Jeruſalem, he went to Ceſarea; where he had with him, over and above the three legions, that had formerly made ſuch havock in Judea under his father, the twelfth legion alſo; which was nevertheleſs brave for that unlucky encounter under Ceſtius; nay on the other ſide, burning with impatience for the opportunity of a revenge for that diſaſter. He order'd the fifth legion to meet him by the way of Ammaus, and the tenth by Jericho; while he himſelf march'd with the reſt, in conjunction with a body of royal auxiliaries, larger than ever heretofore, and a great number of Syrians. The detachments that were ſent by Veſpaſian under Mucianus into Italy, out of the four legions, he made good out of two thouſand choice men of the Alexandrian army that he brought along with him, and three thouſand more that follow'd him from the Euphrates: and there was the beſt of friends alſo, both for integrity and council, Tiberius Alexander, formerly the governor of Egypt, but now choſen to command the army; being the firſt man that own'd and ſtood up for Veſpaſian in the infancy of his government, enter'd into a league with him, and ſtood firm to it in deſpite of all the hazards of an uncertain fortune. He was likewiſe qualify'd with all the natural advantages for martial undertakings, that reſolution, generoſity, and wiſdom, could give a man.

CHAP. II.

Titus marches into the enemy's country; and takes a view of Jeruſalem. The Jews make a deſperate ſally. Titus preſerved by providence. His bravery and conduct.

Titus advances into an enemy's country.

Titus being now advancing into an enemy's country, this was the order of his march. The auxiliaries went firſt; after them the pioneers; and in the next place, thoſe that were to mark out the camp; which were follow'd with the officers baggage, and a convoy: and then came Titus himſelf with his guards; the choiceſt of his men, and his enſign-bearers about him; a body of horſe following them at the head of the machines. The next in courſe were the tribunes, and other officers, with a train of choice men under their command: the Roman eagle after them, with the enſigns of the legions about it, and trumpets before them; the body of the army marching in rank and file, ſix in front; and the common ſoldiers, every man following the legion he belong'd to, with their luggage before them. The mercenaries and their guards brought up the rear. In this order Titus advanced, according to the method of the Roman diſcipline, by the way of Samaria up to Gophna; a place that his father Veſpaſian had formerly taken; and there he found a gariſon, where he took up his lodging that night, and proſecuted his march next morning to a place that the Jews call The valley of Thorns, near the village of Gabath Saul, or, The valley of Saul; where he encamped that evening near thirty † furlongs from Jeruſalem.

Titus marches with a party to take a view of Jeruſalem.

At this place Titus put himſelf at the head of about ſix hundred choice horſe, and led them toward Jeruſalem to take a view of the town, and learn what he could of the ſtate and diſpoſition of the Jews. For being well aſſured that the people were altogether for peace, and as weary every jot of their oppreſſors as they were of the oppreſſion itſelf; and that they wanted nothing, in fine, but ſtrength and opportunity for a revolt; he did not know but that upon the ſight of him and his army, their hearts might fail them, and they might perhaps bethink themſelves of bringing the matter to terms of accommodation before it came to blows. Poſſeſs'd with theſe thoughts, Titus advanced toward the city, and ſo long as he went forward in the ready way to the walls, there was not one creature appear'd upon the battlements. But upon croſſing over toward the turret call'd Pſephinos, there ſallied out a vaſt number of Jews from the gate over againſt the ſepulchre of Helena, on the quarter they call the woman's tower, that brake quite through the middle of Titus's body, and cutting off the communication betwixt the two divided parties, they could not relieve one another. In this confuſion the Jews ſingled out Titus, with a very ſmall number of his people about him, in a place where there was no going forward for the encloſures, gardens, and ditches betwixt him and the wall; and his retreat was intercepted, on the other hand, by a ſtrong body of the enemy that was gotten betwixt him and his own people. But Titus's men not knowing the danger their general was in, and believing him to be yet ſafe and in the crowd, ſhifting for himſelf, they had nothing more to do, they thought, but every man to look to one, and ſo to follow their captain. Titus finding, in this extremity, that he had nothing but his ſword and his courage left him to truſt to, call'd out to his fellow-ſoldiers to follow him, and in the ſame inſtant ſpurred deſperately into the enemies body, to force his way thorough to the reſt of his men. Now this was a time and action to give all people to underſtand how far the providence of God interpoſes in the event of wars, and in the perſonal preſervation of emperors and princes. For Titus, who came not out (as I ſaid) to fight a battle, but to make a diſcovery, had not provided himſelf of arms, either for his head or his body, and yet not one dart or arrow, of all thoſe ſhowers that were thrown againſt him, once touch'd him, but were carried off from the mark, as if they had been deſign'd to miſs it; Titus in the mean time clearing his paſſage on both ſides with his ſword in his hand, overbearing all before him, and trampling his enemies under his horſe's feet. This fearleſs reſolution of Ceſar drew the rage of the whole party upon him with fury and clamour; crying out one to another to fall upon him, as the only check to their ſucceſſes. But which way ſoever Titus turn'd, the Jews fled before him; and yet at the ſame time others preſſing him flank and rear, and his companions all the while ſticking cloſe and bravely to him. They found by this time that there was no way to come off but by one ſeaſonable generous charge, quite thorough and thorough. They made the puſh immediately, wherein one of Titus's friends was kill'd, horſe and man; another overthrown and ſlain, and his horſe taken and carry'd off; while Titus, with the remainder of his people, got back again to his camp, without ſo much as one wound. The Jews took ſuch heart upon this temporary advantage, that they look'd upon it as an earneſt of greater things to follow: but their hopes deceiv'd them.

Titus preſerv'd by a wonderful providence.

The conduct and bravery of Titus.

CHAP. III.

Domeſtick factions are united by a foreign war. The Roman ſoldiers being ſurpriz'd without their arms, are beaten from their camp. A skirmiſh betwixt the Jews and the Romans. Titus miſſing, and the Romans at their wits end to know what was become of him. The Jews make a running fight of it.

UPON the coming up of a legion that night from Ammaus to join Ceſar, he marched away next morning early to Scopos; a place ſeven * furlongs to the northward from the city. It ſtands low, and in a fair proſpect both of the town and of the temple; and ſo properly enough called Scopos. He order'd two legions to encamp upon the place, and the fifth legion to withdraw three † furlongs farther off; where they might intrench without any danger from the enemy, being already wearied off their legs with a tedious night's march. Theſe legions were no ſooner at work upon the orders, but the tenth legion came up from Jericho; a place lately taken and gariſon'd by Veſpaſian. This legion was appointed to encamp ſix ‡ furlongs to the eaſt of Jeruſalem, and the mount of Olives; which is over againſt the city, and the valley of Cedron betwixt them.

THE factions in the town continued tearing one another to pieces, as the bittereſt adverſaries in the world, till the dread of a foreign war and a common enemy reconciled them again. For, upon the very ſight of the Roman camp, and the order of it, the three ſeditious parties agreed the matter, and united again; reaſoning with themſelves upon the equity and neceſſity of ſuch a compoſition, and expoſtulating one with another, after this manner. "What will be the end of this buſineſs, do you think, if we ſtand ſtill to ſee "ourſelves ſurrounded with forts and troops; "our lives and liberties at mercy, and we all "this while coop'd up within walls, and our "arms a-croſs, the tame ſpectators of a licentious war, to the advantage of our enemies, "and our own ruin? Nay, ſays another, we "are only valiant againſt ourſelves, and in "cutting one another's throats to make way "for the Romans to a conqueſt without "blood." Upon this they gather'd into parties and cabals; and in that very inſtant betaking themſelves to their arms, made a furious excurſion croſs the valley upon the tenth legion, with horrid clamours and outcries, as they were intrenching their camp. This ſally was ſuch a ſurprize to the Romans, that they were half diſtracted at it; and it was ſo much the greater, upon an opinion, both that the Jews durſt not offer at it, and that their diviſions had made them incapable of ſuch an agreement. But the ſoldiers, in fine, being at work without their arms, the Jews fell upon them unwares; whereupon every man quitted his poſt: ſome ran quite away, others fled to their arms, but were cut off before they could make uſe of them. Upon the credit of this victory ready to their hands, the Jews came flowing in ſtill more and more; and though they were not in truth very numerous, their good fortune made them appear ſo, both to the Romans and to themſelves. Of all nations under the heavens, the Romans are certainly the people that beſt underſtand the art and diſcipline of war, and diſcharge their military exerciſes and duties with the beſt conduct and grace; and yet upon the aſtoniſhment of this unaccountable ſurprize, they trembled; and turning their backs, the Jews follow'd them upon the purſuit: and upon turning their heads as any of the enemy came up with them, ſome they ſtopp'd or repuls'd, others they kill'd, or wounded; for in the heat of their rage they kept themſelves upon no manner of guard. But as the numbers encreas'd on the one hand, ſo of neceſſity muſt the confuſion on the other, till in the end the Romans were forc'd totally to abandon their camp; and the whole legion had been entirely cut off, if Titus had not come in the preciſe minute to their ſuccour, and, betwixt reproaches of cowardice on the one ſide, and exemplary bravery on the other, put a ſtop to their flight. Titus took this opportunity of joining the fugitives, with a party of choice men he had about him of his own; and charging the Jews in the flank, he kill'd ſeveral of them upon the ſpot, wounded more, and drove the whole body down into the valley in great diſorder, and not without a conſiderable loſs of men, before they could gain the other ſide of the bottom. Upon their paſſing the valley they made a ſtand, and maintain'd a fight with the Romans a croſs it till mid-day. In the afternoon, Titus enforced the legion with the troops he brought to ſuccour it; and poſting parties up and down to ſecure the Romans againſt excurſions, he order'd the remainder of his forces up the mountain, to encamp and fortify upon the top of it.

A ſkirmiſh betwixt the Jews and the Romans.

The Jews that were within diſtance of obſerving this motion from the walls, took it for a direct flight; and one of their intelligencers gave to underſtand as much by a ſignal from the town, by ſhaking a garment in the air, as a way of intelligence concerted among themſelves. Upon this intimation, the Jews ſally'd forth in ſuch an outrageous fury, that they look'd liker a herd of wild beaſts than a multitude of men. The violence was ſo impetuous that not ſo much as one man in the contrary party durſt ſtand the ſhock; but they were all driven, as if it had been by a blow from an engine, ſome one way, and ſome another, preſſing up the mountain all that was poſſible for refuge. About half way up the hill, Titus made a ſtand, with a few of his generous reſolute friends about him; who, out of the veneration they had for the perſon and dignity of the emperor, beſought him not to expoſe any longer his own ſacred life againſt the worthleſs lives of a deſperate rabble of Jews, whoſe condition was ſuch, that death was the beſt thing could befal them; but rather to conſult his own quality and ſafety; minding him that he was not there in the circumſtances of a ſoldier, but in the character of the ſovereign maſter of the world; and that it was not for him to think of ſtanding alone, when the foundations of the earth ſunk under him. Titus took no more notice of what they ſaid than if he had not heard it; but ſtood upon his guard againſt all oppoſers, and encounter'd all aſſaults: cutting ſome over the face, killing others that preſs'd upon him, and forcing ſome again down the mountain into the valley. The vigour and the reſolution of this prince kept them in ſome ſort of awe, though not enough to fright them into the city again: but opening to the right and left, they attack'd his people on each hand of him; while Titus galling them in the flank, gave ſome obſtruction to the purſuit.

When the Romans, from their camp above, took notice what havock was made of their companions below, it ſtruck them with ſuch an horror and amazement, that the whole legion diſpers'd upon it; taking for granted that the Romans were not able to ſtand before the Jews, and that Titus himſelf had quitted the field; or his ſoldiers (they thought) would never have forſaken him. While they were in the diſtraction of this panick terror, running up and down like madmen, they knew not why, nor whither, there was an alarum given to the whole legion, by ſome that had ſeen Titus labouring for life in the middle of his enemies, calling upon them with outcries to haſten away to the reſcue of their general. This reproach, betwixt the ſhame and the conſcience of having abandon'd their commander, tranſported them to ſuch a violent pitch of rage, that, without any farther thought of ſhifting for themſelves, they fell with all their might upon the Jews, and drove them away before them down the brow of the mountain. Not but that they made their retreat fighting too, and for a while diſputed every foot of ground they loſt; till the Romans, by the advantage of the higher ſtation, drove them by force all to the valley. Titus preſs'd hard upon thoſe he had to do withal, and ſo ſent the legion back to make an end of their trenches; he himſelf ſtaying with his own ſoldiers about him, to keep the enemy at a diſtance. Now if I may be allow'd to ſpeak the juſt truth of the matter, without flattery, envy, or detraction, this was the ſecond time that Titus ſav'd this legion in the ſame day. And the ſoldiers were now at liberty to fortify and ſettle their camp.

The paſchal feaſt at hand.

THE Jews had no ſooner a little breathing-while from the hoſtilities of the Romans, but they fell preſently into civil diſcord again among themſelves. The paſchal feaſt, or the feaſt of unleavened bread, being now at hand; that is to ſay, the fourteenth of the month * Xanthicus, which is the day from whence the Jews date their deliverance out of Egypt; Eleazar cauſed the temple gate to be ſet open, for a free entrance to all people that had a mind to come to worſhip. John made uſe of this religious occaſion and pretext, for a cover to a moſt execrable wickedneſs that he had in his heart. He pick'd out a ſelect number of his own people that were the leaſt known, and moſt of them licentious and prophane: and theſe he ſecretly intermingled with the worſhippers; giving them daggers, and private arms under their coats, with inſtructions how to behave themſelves. The temple was immediately all in a tumult both within and without; and this uproar was looked upon as a general deſign upon the whole multitude, by thoſe that were not of the plot. But Eleazar and the Zelotes knew better; and that the malice of this exploit was principally levelled at them: and thereupon the guards drew off from the gates; others leapt down from the towers without ſtriking a blow, and crept into the temple vaults to hide themſelves. The common people that betook themſelves to the altar, were miſerably deſtroy'd; ſome of them ſqueez'd and trampled to death in the croud; others lay weltering in their blood up and down, or their brains beaten out with ſwords and cudgels. Where any man had a pique at another, it was but making him one of the contrary faction to cover his revenge; and a particular grudge was pretence enough to take away any man's life, or to call him a Zelote. But after all theſe barbarous inhumanities upon the innocent, the guilty found ſome ſort of quarter yet, in a connivance of their eſcapes out of thoſe vaults and holes, where they had abſconded. The Zelotes, being now abſolute maſters of the inner-temple, preſſed harder and harder ſtill upon Simon; the faction being now reduced to two diviſions, that were in three before.

The three factions reduced to two.

TITUS was at this time thinking to decamp from Scopos, and to advance nearer Jeruſalem: ſo that in order to his removal, he poſted a competent ſtrength of his beſt troops to prevent and encounter inroads, and gave it in charge to another body of men, to ſee all the ways levelled betwixt that and Jeruſalem. Upon this, the hedges, the walls, and the country people's fences about their gardens, were all taken away, and the trees cut down round about, fruit-trees and all, though never ſo choice; the hollows all filled up, the crags plain'd, and the whole tract of ground from Scopos to Herod's ſepulchre, and the pool of ſerpents (otherwiſe called Bethara) all made ſmooth and even.

Titus moves from Scopos toward Jeruſalem, and gives order for the filling up and levelling all the paſſes.

The Jews lay their heads together to put a cheat upon the Romans. Titus has no faith in the pretence. The Jews out-wit the Romans. Titus threatens his men with martial law; but upon the officers mediation, Titus grants them their pardon. The ſiege of Jeruſalem.

The Jews deſign a cheat upon the Romans.

THE Jews had at this time a plot in their heads, how to put a trick upon the Romans. Some of the boldeſt of the party made a ſtep out of the town, a little beyond the place they call the womens towers; upon a pretence, that they were forced out of the city, for fear of a party within it that was for peace; and that they durſt not venture any farther, for fear of the Romans: but there they kept themſelves as cloſe, and as much out of ſight as they could. There was at the ſame time another party upon the walls, bawling out as loud as they could, and in the name of the inhabitants, for a peace and an alliance with the Romans; imploring them at the ſame time to come over to them, and they would open them the gates. And for the better grace of this impoſture, they counterfeited a ſquabble and a conteſt among themſelves: ſome pretending to preſs out to the Romans; and others caſting ſtones at them to hinder, them and ſtill perſiſting in appearance either by fair means or by foul to make their way. At this rate, after ſeveral feigned attempts and repulſes, they returned back again like mad-men at the diſappointment. The cheat went down well enough with the common ſoldiers, who look'd upon the town to be as good as their own already, and preſs'd ſo eagerly to be in action, as if there had been nothing wanting, but the ceremony of opening the gates to put them in poſſeſſion of it. But Titus had no faith at all in the pretext of this invitation; having made them an offer by Joſeph, but the day before, of as much as they ſeemed now to deſire, and they rejected the propoſal. So that Titus commanded his ſoldiers every man of them to ſtand to their arms, and to maintain their poſts. But in the mean while, ſome of thoſe that were employed upon the trenches, betook themſeves to their weapons in a hurry, and ran toward the gates. The Jews, that pretended to be driven out of the town, let them paſs by without any interruption, till they were got up within a little of ſome of the towers near the port; and then following them cloſe upon the rear, they hemmed them in within reach of ſtones, darts, and all manner of ſhot of that quality from the walls; where great numbers of them were kill'd and wounded; being ſo pent up by thoſe that preſſed upon the backs of them, that there was no getting clear of the wall: beſide that, betwixt ſhame and confuſion on the one hand for their diſobedience, and the fear of puniſhment for it on the other, they were hardened into a reſolution of proſecuting what they had begun. But, in fine, after a long diſpute, and with an equal loſs on both ſides, the Romans in the concluſion broke thorough the body of the Jews; who yet purſu'd them in their retreat with lances, and other ſuch-like weapons, as far as the ſepulchre of Helena: and not without inſolent and contemptuous reproaches upon the Romans, for being out-witted, and made ſuch fools of. This they did, waving their bucklers over their heads; leaping and dancing all the way they went, with ſhouts of joy and triumph.

Titus has no faith in the pretence.

The Jews out-wit the Romans.

WHEN the Romans were thus come off, their officers treated them with menaces and ſcorn; and Titus himſelf received them with a ſpeech of reſentment and indignation, to the following purpoſe. "How comes it, ſays he, "that the Jews, that have nothing but their "deſpair for their directors, ſhould yet ma-"nage their affairs with ſo much conſidera-"tion, ſtratagem and ſucceſs?" The queſtion is anſwer'd in one word: they live in obedience to their ſuperiors, and in good will and union one with another: "Whereas the "Romans, that have been hitherto ſo famous for "their excellent order and diſcipline, and "conſequently for their good fortune, are "now fallen off, and deſtroy'd by the head-"ſtrong intemperances of their own folly, in "making war without officers; and, which "is worſt of all, Ceſar himſelf to be a ſpecta-"tor of this. What a ſcandal will this be "to the very rules and methods of arms! or "what will my father ſay, do ye think, when "he ſhall come to hear of it; a general, that "in the whole courſe of a long and a military "life, never met with any thing like it before? "Now ſuch is the ſeverity of martial law, "that it makes it capital for any man to de-"part from the ſtrict rule of diſcipline, even "in a ſmall matter; but in this caſe, the whole "army is a deſerter. And be it known to "you all, that, according to the ſtrictneſs of "the Roman conduct, victory itſelf is a ſcan-

Titus gives his men a ſevere reproof, and threatens to deliver them up to the law.

"dal when it is gain'd not under the direction "and command of the general."

The ſoldiers interpoſe on their behalf, and Ceſar pardons them.

TITUS delivered theſe words with ſome ſort of indignation; which gave the officers to underſtand, that the law was to be executed: and upon this, the whole body of the offenders gave themſelves for loſt; being ſatisfy'd in their conſciences, that they had deſerv'd the juſtice they fear'd. But, in this interval, the legions did in a manner beſet Titus, with petitions and interceſſions on the behalf of their unfortunate companions; imploring his mercy toward the failings of a few raſh people, for the ſake of a greater number that ſtood firm; and upon an aſſurance that they would attone by their future ſervices for their paſt faults. Ceſar found his intereſt, as well as his inclination, in complying with this mediation; for tho' in the caſe of a ſingle perſon diſobeying orders, it may be requiſite to uſe ſeverity, the ſame reaſon does not hold yet in a multitude. Titus, in fine, forgave and forgot all that was paſt; upon condition, that his people would be more dutiful and cautious for the time to come: and from thence forward he ſet his thoughts at work, how to revenge himſelf on the treacherous Jews.

The ſiege of Jeruſalem.

HIS firſt buſineſs was to lay all level betwixt himſelf and the town; which was the work only of four days: after which, he ordered the beſt of his troops to advance towards the ramparts, betwixt north and weſt: the foot drawn up in ſeven batallions, and the horſe in three ſquadrons, with archers betwixt them. This being a force ſufficient to prevent or repel all excurſions, the baggage of the three legions, and the train thereunto belonging, were all out of danger.

TITUS encamping at the diſtance of two * furlongs from the city, over-againſt the tower called Pſephinos, upon that angle of the wall, where it winds off from the north to the weſtward; intrenching alſo another part of his army toward the tower Hippicos, about two furlongs likewiſe from the city; keeping the tenth legion ſtill where it was, upon mount Olivet.

The deſcription of Jeruſalem. Three walls

THE city of Jeruſalem was ſurrounded with three walls, ſaving only upon the quarter toward the inacceſſible valleys, where there was but one. It was erected upon two hills; the one directly fronting the other, and a deep valley betwixt them; all cover'd with houſes. The mountain that the upper town ſtands upon, is much the higher and the ſteeper of the two; and for the ſtrength of the ſituation, king David, the father of Solomon that erected the temple, gave it the name formerly of the fortreſs or caſtle; and this is it which we call at this day the upper market.

The lower town.

THE lower town is ſeated upon an hill that bears the name of Acra, with a ſteep declivity round about it. There was formerly another hill alſo over-againſt this, ſomewhat lower than the Acra, and divided from it by a large valley: but in the time of the Aſmoneans, their princes filled up this bottom; and cutting off from the hill Acra, they join'd the town to the temple; by which means it overlooked and commanded all the reſt.

The valley of Tyropeon, and the fountain of Siloe.

THE name of the valley aforeſaid, that ſeparates the upper town from the lower, is Tyropeon; and it ſtretches as far as to the fountain of Siloe: that affords an excellent water to drink, and great plenty of it.

THERE are likewiſe without the town two other towns ſeated upon hills, next to inacceſſible, by the crags and precipices every where round about them.

The old wall impregnable.

THE oldeſt of the three walls was extremely ſtrong, by reaſon of the depth of the valley below, and the over-hanging of the rock from above, whereupon it was erected. And beſide the natural advantage of the ſituation, it had all the helps that David and Solomon, and ſeveral other princes, could contribute to the further ſtrengthening of it, by art, induſtry, and expence. It began on that ſide, at the tower Hippicos; and ſo to another tower call'd the Galleries, running along by the town-houſe, to the weſt porch of the temple. It paſſed on the other ſide, reckoning from the ſame place, by † Bethſo, down to the Eſſene gate, and ſo ſouthward, by the fountain of Siloe; where it ſtrikes off to the eaſtward, toward the pool of Solomon; and thence by Ophlas, to the eaſt porch of the temple.

THE ſecond wall begins at Genath, a gate belonging to the former wall; and ſo runs on, upon the north ſide of the city, to the fort Antonia.

THE third wall began at the tower Hippicos, and ſo ran northward to that of Pſephinos; over-againſt Helena's ſepulchre, the queen of Adiabena, and mother of king Izates; keeping along by the royal caves, from the tower at the corner, toward that which they call the Fullers-monument; whence it came up to the old wall in the vale of Cedron: and this was the compaſs of it. This wall was the work of Agrippa, for the ſecurity of that part of the town that he had built, which was otherwiſe naked and defenceleſs. The city was by this time grown ſo populous, that the place was too narrow for the inhabitants; ſo that by little and little they crept out into a kind of ſuburbs, and on the north ſide of the temple next the hill, their buildings encreas'd extremely.

THERE was a fourth mountain that fronted Antonia, with ditches cut out, of a prodigious depth betwixt them; inſomuch, that there was no coming at the foundation of Antonia, to undermine it: beſide that, the ſinking of the trench added ſo much to the height of the tower. They gave the fourth mountain the name of Bezeth, or the New-town; being an enlargement only of the former. When this place came to be inhabited, the people earneſtly deſired to have it fortified: and Agrippa, the father of this king of the ſame name, modelled his deſign, and ran up this wall about it; as you have heard. But upon a ſuggeſtion of fancy, that Claudius Ceſar might perhaps take ſome offence and jealouſy at the pomp and oſtentation of ſo magnificent a work, Agrippa went no farther than the laying of the foundations, and ſo dropp'd the project: but if he had gone on, Jeruſalem could never have been taken.

THE ſtones of this wall were twenty * cubits in length, and ten over; and ſo hard and firm withal, that they were proof either againſt mining or battery. The wall was alſo ten cubits thick, and it would have been anſwerably high in proportion, if the fear of Claudius (as I told you) had not put a ſtop to Agrippa's deſign. The Jews, 'tis true, carry'd up the wall afterwards to twenty cubits, with battlements of two † cubits at the top, and parapets of three; which in all make ‡ five and twenty cubits. The wall was fortified with towers of twenty cubits ſquare, every jot as ſubſtantial as the very wall; and not inferior, for ſtrength and beauty, to the ſtones and workmanſhip of the temple itſelf. Theſe towers were rais'd twenty cubits above the wall, with winding ſtair-caſes leading up to them; lodgings and eating rooms on the top, and ciſterns for rain-water. Upon the third wall there were ninety towers all of a make, and at the equal diſtance of two § hundred cubits one from another. The middle wall had only fourteen towers; the old wall, ſixty; and thirty  three furlongs was the compaſs of the whole city.

The third wall was all over a wonderful piece of workmanſhip from one end to the other; but yet not comparable to the tower call'd Pſephinos: it ſtands upon the angle of the wall, north-weſt of the city, upon that quarter where Titus had encamp'd. The height of it was ſeventy †† cubits; and ſo advantageous a proſpect, that in a clear day one might ſee Arabia from it, the ſea, and the uttermoſt confines of the Hebrews. The figure of it was with eight angles. Juſt againſt this was the tower Hippicos, and there were near at hand two other towers of Herod's erecting upon the old wall, which for ſize, curioſity, and ſtrength, were looked upon as the moſt famous maſter-pieces in the world: for the king, over and above the natural greatneſs of his mind, gratify'd the impulſe of his inclination alſo, in doing all he could for the good and glory of the city. He dedicated his three towers to the honour and memory of the three perſons he had the greateſt eſteem for in the world; his brother, his friend, and his wife: the two former having ſignaliz'd themſelves by dying glorioufly in the field of battle; the other being put to death by himſelf, out of a ſpirit of jealouſy.

Three famous towers to the honour of his brother, his friend, and wife.

THE tower of Hippicos (the name of one of his friends) had four angles, five and twenty cubits over, and thirty ‡‡ in height, and the whole body of it ſolid. Above this was a platform of ſtones accurately jointed; and a receptacle for rain water, of twenty cubits deep. Over this terras were yet two ſtories of five and twenty cubits each, and divided into ſeveral chambers or quarters; and over that building were battlements of two cubits high, and parapets of three cubits all around; amounting in the whole to the height of eighty §§ five cubits.

Hippicos, Phaſaelus, and Mariamne.

HEROD call'd the ſecond tower Phaſael, by the name of his brother. It was forty  cubits ſquare, and in height, after the manner of a pillar; all maſſive within from top to bottom. And above this was a porch of ten cubits high, ſupported with arches, and ſet out with other curioſities. Over the middle of this porch was another, with rich baths and apartments to it, ſuitable to the magnificence of the royal founder. On the top of it were battlements and fortifications; the whole height of the tower falling little ſhort of ninety †‡ cubits. It had at a diſtance ſome reſemblance of the watch-tower of Pharos, the famous ſea-mark to thoſe that ſailed toward Alexandria; only much the larger of the two, and at this time the reſidence of Simón, that tyrannical oppreſſor.

HEROD gave the third tower the name of the queen Mariamne, his wife. It was twenty cubits ſquare, length and breadth, and five †‡ and fifty cubits high. It muſt be allowed, that the ſtructure, the rooms, and the furniture, of the two other towers, were rich and pompous; but they were yet as much below the curioſity, the beauty, and the ornament of this, as this fell ſhort of the ſtrength and dignity of the other two: the king rightly diſtinguiſhing betwixt the maſculine virtues of the two heroes, Hippicos and Phaſael, and the ſoft tenderneſs of a fair lady in the perſon of Mariamne.

Now as to theſe three towers, the height was prodigious; and yet the place they were rais'd upon, made it ſeem much more than it was. For the old wall they ſtood upon, was itſelf erected upon a very high piece of ground: and theſe turrets again were advanc'd upon the top of a mountain, that was yet thirty cubits higher than the antient wall. Neither were they leſs admirable for the materials they were made of, than for the ſtructure. The ſtones were neither common, nor of a weight to be removed with hands; but of white marble cut out into into planks of twenty cubits long, ten in breadth, and five cubits deep; and ſo artificially put together, that there was no joints to be ſeen; but every diſtinct tower look'd like one entire piece.

The palace royal

THUS was on the north-ſide of the city, and juſt within it there ſtood a royal palace, ſo rich and curious, that it is not for the tongue of man to expreſs it: beſide that, it was all encloſed with a wall of thirty cubits in height, and turrets of the beſt work and maſters, planted at equal diſtances one from another round about it; with ſplendid lodgings and treating-rooms to receive an hundred perſons. There was an incredible collection of the choiceſt marbles for variety and beauty, that could be gotten for money. The beams and timbers that ſupported the roofs were for length and thickneſs beyond imagination; and ſo were the ornamental additions toward the finiſhing of the work. There were a world of chambers with commodious paſſages, and contrivances innumerable; for ſight as well as for convenience; the whole being magnificently ſet out and furniſh'd, with all the advantages of gold and ſilver, and whatever elſe was precious. There were alſo porches and galleries in abundance, leading in a kind of circle from one to another, and in each of them a row of pillars. Now for the diſtances betwixt thoſe pillars that lay to the open air, nothing could be more agreeable than the proſpect of ſo many groves and nurſeries of ſo many ſeveral plants; long and pleaſant walks, beſet with ciſterns, fountains pipes, and brazen figures to ſpout out water, with volaries of tame pigeons gathering about it for refreſhment. But it is impoſſible for any man to do this palace right in the deſcription of it; beſide that my heart bleeds at the very thought of the ſtory, to conſider what a devaſtation hath been made here by an impious crew of incendiaries and traytors. For this conflagration was not the work of the Romans, but of a band of wicked miſcreants, as we have already obſerv'd upon the beginning of this ſedition, who burnt all from the fort Antonia; and then carrying it on to the palace, ſet fire to the roofs of the three towers.

A diſmal conflagration.

THE temple was built, as I ſaid, upon a very hard rock, which was ſo ſteep on all hands, that at firſt there was ſcarce ground ſufficient on the top of it for the temple, and the encloſure that was to be about it. But when king Solomon erected this fabrick, he order'd the running up of a wall to the eaſtward of it, to keep up the earth: and having ſo far ſecur'd it, he built a porch upon the rampart. There was not as yet any other fortification; but the people carrying up earth from time to time afterwards to ſupply the defect, the hill came by degrees to be enlarged. They brake down ſome time after this the north wall, and took in as much ground there too, as ſerved in time to come for the foundation of the whole temple.

THE deſign ſucceeding ſo much beyond expectation, they encompaſs'd the hill with three walls; but with a prodigious expence of time and treaſure: for it was not only a work of many ages; but the whole maſs of religious oblations from all parts of the world, to the honour and ſervice of God and his worſhip, was ſpent upon this undertaking, reckoning the charge as well of the upper as of the lower temple; which latter was erected upon a foundation of at leaſt three * hundred cubits deep, and in ſome places more; but the depth did not appear, in regard that the valley was now fill'd up to the very level of the ſtreets in the city. The ſtones provided for this mighty undertaking, were of forty cubits in length; which gave them to underſtand, that there was nothing impoſſible where there was money and good-will; and that conſtancy, time, and patience, could work miracles.

The ſituation, magnificence, and ſtructure of the temple.

AS the foundations were wonderful, ſo the dignity of the ſuperſtructure was not inferior to that of the ground work. The galleries above were all double, upheld by pillars of white marble all of a piece, and five and twenty cubits in height, and wainſcotted with cedar; which, for the curioſity of the work, and the ſmoothneſs of the grain, was a delightful entertainment to the ſpectator, without, need of any additional ornaments either of painting or carving. They were all thirty cubits over, and ſix † furlongs the whole compaſs of them, including the tower Antonia. In the open air, where there was no covering over head, the ground was pav'd and chequer'd with all ſorts of ſtones: but the way to the ſecond temple was lin'd on each hand with ſtone balluſters, delicately wrought and poliſhed, of three cubits high. In this paſſage there were alſo ſeveral pillars orderly diſpos'd, with inſcriptions and precepts upon them in Latin and Greek, upon the ſubject of continence and chaſtity, and forbidding ſtrangers to enter into that holy place. For the ſecond temple was call'd holy, and it was fourteen ſteps above the firſt. The figure of it was four-ſquare, with a wall of its own; which, though forty cubits without, was yet but five and twenty cubits within, the place being cover'd with the ſteps that led to mount it. Now this wall being built upon an advance ground, with ſtairs to it, part of the inſide was ſo blinded with the mountain that it could not be diſcerned.

AT the top of theſe fourteen ſteps, there was a plain level of three hundred cubits up to the wall; and from thence, five ſteps more to the gates of the temple. There were alſo

* Three hundred cubits amounted to ſomething upwards of five hundred and forty ſix Engliſh feet, that is one hundred and eighty yards and two feet.

† Six furlongs amounted to three quarters of an Engliſh mile, and nine geometrical paces, as hath been before obſerved

four from the north, as many from the ſouth, and two from the eaſt.

The womens oratory.

THE women had an oratory, or a worſhipping place by themſelves, with a partition wall to it, and two gates; one to the ſouth, the other to the north; which were the two only paſſages of entrance to the women: neither were they permitted to paſs their own; for that place was free indifferently to women inhabitants, as well as ſtrangers that came thither upon devotion. The weſt ſide of it was a dead wall, without any door at all. Betwixt the aforeſaid gates, and over-againſt the wall within near the treaſury, there were galleries with ſtately pillars to ſupport them, plain and ſimple, and not much inferior to thoſe below.

SOME of theſe gates were plated all over with gold and ſilver; poſts, front and all; but there was one, without the temple, of Corinthian braſs; which is much the moſt curious metal of the three. There were double doors to every gate, each thirty cubits high, and * fifteen broad. They were wider within, and withdrawing-rooms on each hand, of thirty cubits ſquare, after the manner of turrets; and upward of twenty cubits high; and each of them borne up with pillars of twelve † cubits in thickneſs, the other gates being of the ſame dimenſions in proportion. As to the Corinthian portal on the eaſt-ſide of the temple where the women came in, it was undoubtedly the largeſt, and the moſt magnificent of them all; for it was fifty ‡ cubits high, the gates forty; and the gold and ſilver plates upon it more ſubſtantial than thoſe that Alexander, the father of Tiberias, laid upon the other nine. There were fifteen ſteps from the wall that parted the men and the women to the great gate; which was five ſhort of thoſe that led to the other gates.

The holy ſanctuary.

THE temple itſelf; that is to ſay, the holy temple or ſanctuary, was placed in the middle, with twelve ſtairs up to it. The height of it was an hundred § cubits, and the breadth as many in the front; but backward it wanted forty of the number. For upon the entrance, there were two additions raiſed (like two ſhoulders) of twenty cubits each. The height of the firſt gate was ſeventy cubits, and five and twenty over; but it had no doors to it, being a figure of heaven, open and viſible to the whole world. The front and outſides of it were all over gilded; and nothing to be ſeen in the inſide of the temple neither, which had not likewiſe a dazling luſtre.

The inner part of it, with the partitions.

THE inner part of it was divided into two partitions. The firſt of them in ſight was open to the top, which was ninety  cubits in height, forty in length, and twenty over. The inſide of the gate was, as I ſaid, plated all over with gold, and the wall gilded every where about it. There were alſo leaves and branches of vines over head, and cluſters of grapes equal to the bigneſs of a man, that hung dangling down all of gold too. The other partition of the temple being ciel'd above, appear'd the lower of the two. The doors to it were of gold, five and fifty cubits in height, and ſixteen †† broad, with a piece of Babylonian tapeſtry hanging before them, of the ſame dimenſions, and interwoven with blue, purple, and ſcarlet, moſt artificially put together, and wrought to admiration. And the mixture was not a bare curioſity neither, but a myſtical alluſion to the four clements, either by the colours, or by the matter they were made of; the ſcarlet repreſenting the fire, the ſilk the earth that produc'd it, the azure, the air, and the purple, the ſea from whence it comes. So that this veil or hanging was an emblem of the univerſe, only excepting the celeſtial ſigns.

THIS entrance leads you into the lower part of the temple; the height and length of it ſixty ## cubits, and the breadth twenty. This length of ſixty cubits was then ſubdivided into two unequal parts, one of forty cubits, and the other of twenty. The former part of forty cubits, had in it the three wonderful rarities that had been celebrated over the whole world; the candleſtick, the table, and the altar of incenſe. The candleſtick had ſeven branches, (all out of the ſame ſtem) with ſeven lights, repreſenting the ſeven planets. The twelve loaves of ſhew-bread upon the table pointed at the twelve ſigns in the Zodiack, and the courſe of the year. By the thirteen ſorts of perfumes in the cenſer upon the altar of incenſe (divers of theſe odours being extracted out of the deep of the inhoſpitable ſea) we are given to underſtand that God is maſter of the univerſe, and that all things are made for his honour and ſervice.

The candleſtick, the table, and the altar, three pieces of art.

THE inner part of the temple, being only twenty cubits in height, was divided by a veil alſo from the other, and nothing at all in it; neither was any man permitted to enter in, or ſo much as look into it; and it was called the ſanctuary, or the Holy of Holies. Upon the ſides of this lower temple there were ſeveral lodgings, leading from one to another, with three ſtories over head, and paſſages into them out of the great portal. Now the upper part being narrower than the other, could not have the convenience of the ſame order of chambers; but it was forty cubits higher, though the leſs ſplendid of the two. The height, in fine, upon the whole, was an hundred cubits, and the plan only ſixty.

The outſide of the temple.

THE beauty and curioſity of the temple, on the outſide, was agreeable and charming beyond imagination; being fac'd every where with ſubſtantial golden plates, that ſparkled like the morning ſun; and every jot as dazling to the eye to gaze upon them. Where there was no gilding, the ſtructure was all ſo delicately white, that it look'd at a diſtance to travellers like a marble mountain, or a pillar of ſnow.

The roof. THE roof of the temple was cover'd and arm'd all over with pointed ſpikes of gold, to keep off the birds from neſtling upon it and fouling it. There were a great many ſtones in this building, of forty * five cubits long, † five in height, and ſix ‡ cubits broad.

The altar before the temple. THE altar before the temple was †† fifteen cubits high, and ſquare; and four angles to it like horns. The aſcent to this altar was on the ſouth-ſide, and very difficult by reaſon of the declivity of the paſſage. There came no hammer upon it, nor any iron-tool in the working of it.

THERE was a partition rais'd of ſtone work, curiouſly wrought, and of one cubit in height, encloſing the temple and the altar, and ſeparating the people from the prieſts.

No unclean perſons admitted into it No people troubled with the Gonorrhea, and no lepers were ſuffer'd, either in the temple, or in the city. No women were allow'd to come near the temple in the time of their courſes; and even when they were over, not to paſs further than as we have ſaid above. Neither were men permitted to enter the inner temple without being firſt purify'd, and even then alſo, they were not to mingle with the prieſts.

THOSE of the § ſacerdotal race, that were hinder'd by any defect from the exerciſe of their function, took their places yet with thoſe that had none, and had their allowances in common with the reſt; only under the diſtinction of a lay habit: for no man is allow'd to wear the veſtments of a prieſt, but he that actually executes the office.

The prieſts exemplary in life and converſation. THE prieſts that ſerved in the temple and at the altar, were to be perſons exemplary in their lives and converſations, and without either ſcandal or blemiſh: Their clothing fine linen; temperate and abſtemious in their eating and drinking, for the reverence of the holy function. The high-prieſt went up with the other prieſts to the altar every ſeventh day, and upon the firſt day of every month, and upon all publick anniverſary feſtivals; where he officiated in a veil girt about him, and hanging down over part of his thighs; with a linen veil under it that reach'd down to the ground: and over both theſe, he wore a large violet colour'd garment, fring'd at the bottom; and golden bells and pomegranates interchangeably faſten'd to it: the bells repreſenting the thunder, and the pomegranates the lightning.

The prieſts veil.

And the myſtery of it. His pectoral was ty'd about him with party colour'd ribbons; as gold colour, purple, ſcarlet, linen and violet: which were the colours alſo, as I have ſaid already, of the veils of the temple.

The Ephod. THE mixture of the Ephod was the ſame too, only more of gold in it; and in the ſhape of it, not much unlike that of a breaſt piece. It was bound together with two golden buckles in the figure of aſps, and ſet with ſardonyx ſtones, the largeſt and the richeſt that were to be got, with the names of the twelve tribes of Iſrael inſcrib'd upon them. There were alſo four rows of precious ſtones, hanging down in the order of three and three in a row: that is to ſay, a ſardonyx, topaz, emerald, carbuncle, jaſper, ſapphire, agat, amethyſt, a lynx ſtone, onyx, a beryl, and a chryſolite; with the ſame names upon them reſpectively as before.

HE had upon his head a ſilken tiara, with a crown over it of violet colour; and another crown over that of gold, with the ſacred vowels engraven upon it.

THE high-prieſt's  every day's habit was not ſo rich and magnificent; but this was only made uſe of for the ſolemnity of once a year; and that for him alone too, and when he enter'd into the holy of holies; which day was ſtrictly obſerv'd as a religious faſt. But I ſhall have occaſion hereafter, and elſewhere, to be more particular upon the ſubject of the city, the temple, and our laws and cuſtoms, as there ſhall be occaſion for it.

The fort of Antonia. THE fortreſs of Antonia was built in an angle, betwixt the two galleries of the firſt temple, looking weſt and north. It was rais'd upon a rock of fifty cubits in height; inacceſſibly ſteep on all hands; and, in fine, Herod's maſter-piece, both for magnificence and contrivance. The rock was faced and cruſted with thin ſcales of marble from the bottom to the top, both for ornament and for ſecurity-ſake; for it was ſo ſlippery, that there was no going up or down. This tower was enclos'd with a wall only of three cubits high; and within that compaſs ſtood the caſtle of Antonia of forty cubits; with the ſtate, ſplendour, and conveniences of a court, lodgings, and offices for all purpoſes; ſpacious halls, and places of parade for the uſe and ſervice of a camp. So that for matter of neceſſaries, it was rather a city than a fort; and for the magnificence, it look'd like a palace. It was, upon the whole, the reſemblance of a tower, and encompaſſed with four other towers at equal diſtances one from another, and one from every corner: three of them of fifty cubits in height; and the fourth, that look'd to the ſouth and eaſtward, of ſeventy cubits; and from thence they had the view of the whole temple. From the place where the galleries join'd, there were upon the right and left two pair of ſtairs; which ſerv'd for a paſſage to the ſoldiers into the temple: for when the Romans were maſters of Jeruſalem, there were guards poſted ſtill upon that quarter, to prevent ſeditions upon their publick feſtivals and meetings. The temple commanded the city, as Antonia commanded the temple. This place had a guard upon it, and Herod's palace was as good as a fort to the upper town. The mountain Bezeth (the top mountain of them all) was cut off, as I ſaid before, from Antonia, and join'd to part of the new town: beſide that it was the only blind upon the north ſide of the temple. This is all I have to ſay at preſent of the city and the walls; being to ſpeak further of them hereafter.

* Forty five cubits amounted to eighty two Engliſh feet, that is twenty ſeven yards and a foot.

Simon fifteen thousand strong.

SIMON had a body of ten thousand men, beside Idumeans; which were five thousand more; fifteen thousand in all: ten thousand of them under fifty captains, and Simon himself the commander in chief: the other five thousand under twenty officers; and these were the most daring mutinous part of the whole faction. The principals among them were James the son of Sosas, and Simon the son of Cathlas.

John with six thousand men possess'd of the temple.

JOHN was now in possession of the temple, with six thousand men, under the command of twenty captains; and there came in to him (all quarrels apart) four and twenty hundred of the Zelotes; who listed themselves under Eleazar, whom they had formerly serv'd, and Simon the * son of Jair.

Simon master of the upper town,

IN this opposition of the two parties the people were a common booty, and the least seditious were a prey to them both. Simon was now master of the upper town, and the great wall as far as Cedron, and so likewise of the old wall that runs out to Siloe; and the bending to the eastward goes on to the palace of Monobazus. This Monobazus was the king of the Adiabenians, a people beyond Euphrates.

and Monobazus of the hill Acra.

He was possess'd also of the hill Acra, the seat of the lower town, as far as the royal residence of Helena the mother of Monabazus.

The Romans at the very gates, and the sedition in the town as hot yet as ever.

JOHN all this while had the command of the temple, and some places about it; but for Ophlas, and the vale of Cedron, and what lay betwixt him and Simon, it was all consum'd to ashes, and of no other use or service than for a field of battle. The Romans were at this time drawn up before the very gates; and yet the sedition within the walls continued as fierce and furious as ever. The ememy's pressing upon them brought them now and then, by fits, to their senses again: but upon the least intermission, they presently relaps'd, and broke out into factions and divisions among themselves; contending afresh again upon the foot of their former pretensions. Now this was the greatest service to the Romans they could have possibly done them; for they treated one another worse than they were treated by the common enemy: having this comfort yet in their misery, that they had no new calamity to fear. They were put to harder extremities, 'tis true, before the city was totally destroy'd; but the Romans did yet a greater thing than the taking of the place: for whereas the sedition did but destroy the city, they destroy'd the very sedition; which was a far greater work than the bare demolishing of the walls. So that, in short, the Jews themselves brought this ruin upon their own heads, and the Romans were only the executioners of divine justice upon them for their impieties; as will better appear in what follows.

Titus takes a view of the place where to give the assault.

WHILE matters were at this pass in the city, Titus with a party of choice horse took the whole tour of the walls, to consider upon what quarter it lay most expos'd to an attack. There was no coming at it he saw, for either horse or foot, by the way of the vallies; and on the other side, the first wall was so firm, that it was proof against their battering engines. He bethought himself a while, and after a little pause pitch'd upon that part of the line toward the sepulchre of John the high-priest, as the place that lay the most exposed to an assault; both as the first wall was lower there, and likewise cut off from the second wall; the fortifying of that place being neglected, in regard that the new city was not as yet peopled enough to attend it: beside (he conceived) that they might pass from thence to the third wall, and so to the upper town; and, with the help of Antonia, take the very temple itself.

Titus's friend Nicanor, at the same time, basely wounded for advising a peace.

WHILE Titus was a considering and weighing these things within himself, a particular friend of his, Nicanor by name, was wounded in the left shoulder by an arrow from the wall, as he was labouring with Joseph (being an excellent speaker) to bring the Jews over to desire a peace. Titus was so transported at the ungrateful behaviour of these people toward their best friends and advisers, that he immediately took up a resolution of besieging the town in form, and taking it by force. Upon this, he gave the soldiers the pillage of the suburbs; ordering them to make use of the rubbish and ruins for works and platforms. He divided his army into three bodies, assigning to all his troops their work and stations. He disposed of his archers and slingers upon the mounts, in the middle of the body; with engines to cast stones and other shot before them; which serv'd them to two purposes, either to repel the enemy's sallies, or to hold them in play upon the walls. The trees were all cut down, and the suburbs laid naked in an instant; and the timber employ'd upon fortifications. All hands, in fine, were at work on the Roman side; and the Jews were not idle neither.

Titus in revenge resolves upon a siege in form, and to carry it by force.

THE people that had been formerly exposed to robberies and murders, finding the faction so wholly taken up in their own defence, began to flatter themselves with some prospect of ease, in the very hope that the Romans themselves, if they got the better of it, would effectually revenge their quarrel, by putting it into their power to do themselves justice. John's people made a very vigorous opposition to the besiegers; but he himself durst not stir out of the temple for fear of Simon. Now Simon, being posted next the enemy, was never out of action. He planted all along the wall the shot and engines that he had formerly taken from Cestius, and out of the fort of Antonia. But his people made little advantage of it, for want of understanding the right uſe and management of them; only ſome little skill they had got from here and there a deſerter among them. But yet the Jews made uſe of them however, to gall the enemy from the ramparts, with ſtones and arrows: ſallying out alſo in ſmall parties, and coming to handy blows with the Romans: who on the other ſide cover'd their workmen with hurdles and * Gabions. The Roman legions had every one of them wonderful machines, to diſappoint the inſults of an enemy: the tenth eſpecially; not only for the caſting of larger ſtones, but for throwing them farther. Every ſtone was of a talent † weight; and did execution not only at hand, but to the top of the walls or ramparts; though it were at a full ‡ furlong diſtance: and where it fell, it carry'd a whole file before it. The Jews were ſeveral ways advertiſed of theſe ſtones: firſt, as they were white, and eaſily diſcern'd in their paſſage; ſecondly, by the noiſe they made in the air; and thirdly, by the notice that was given from thoſe that were ſet to watch them: for there were people plac'd up and down upon the towers, to obſerve the playing of theſe engines; and ſtill as any of them were diſcharged, the watch man cry'd out in his mother tongue, (THE STONE COMES) which gave every man time to look to himſelf, and get out of harm's way, ſo that the ſtone often fell without doing any manner of execution. The Romans after this, diſcoloured the ſtones, that they might not be diſcover'd in their courſe; and by the help of that invention, killed ſeveral Jews ſometimes at one blow. But this was not enough yet to divert the Jews from oppoſing the progreſs of the Romans in their fortifications; for they perſiſted night and day in doing all that was poſſible to be done, by policy and courage, to obſtruct their proceeding.

So ſoon as the Romans had completed their works, they caſt down a line and plummet, to take meaſure of the diſtance betwixt the mount and the wall: which could not be done otherwiſe; for there was no abiding near it for the ſhot and darts that were ſhower'd down from above. When they found the place juſt fit for the rams, Titus order'd them to be brought up, and the other machines to be advanced nearer the wall, that they might have more liberty to play: and hereupon, they ſet three batteries at work at a time upon three ſeveral parts of the wall. The terrible noiſe and knocking of theſe engines was heard all over the city; with the cries of citizens upon the terror of it, and the faction itſelf trembling under the apprehenſion. The divided members of this ſedition, finding themſelves now to be all under one common danger, bethought them ſelves of joining in one common defence: crying out one to another, that at this rate they were only doing the enemies work; and if they could not agree to make a firm and laſting union among themſelves it, would behove them however at preſent to join unanimouſly in a confederacy againſt the Romans. Simon, upon this, ſent away a herald to thoſe that had ſhut themſelves up in the temple; with commiſſion to tell them, that ſo many of them as had a mind to quit the temple, and advance to the wall, had free liberty to do it. John did not much confide in the good faith of the meſſage; but left his people to their own freedom.

Titus advances with his rams, and orders three attacks.

The factions propoſe joining in one common defence.

The factions united immediately upon this overture; and, forgetting former animoſities, march'd directly up to the walls in a full body. So ſoon as they had poſted themſelves for their purpoſe, they fell to work with their fires and torches upon the Roman engines: preſſing furiouſly alſo upon thoſe that had the ordering of them, and plying them with darts and other weapons of offence without intermiſſion. In this heat of rage and reſolution, the Jews leap'd down deſperately from the walls in troops, upon the very engines, tore off their covers, and broke in upon the guards that were ſet to defend them, doing ſome execution by skill, but more by an outragious boldneſs.

They match immediately up to the walls is a full body, and fall deſperately upon the Roman enginiers

But Titus, who never fail'd his friends in a time of need, clapt a party of horſe and archers upon the guard of the machines, to keep off the fire, and holding the Jews in play upon the walls, to leave the engineers at liberty to do execution. But all this battery made little or no impreſſion yet: only the ram of the fifth legion ſhook the corner of a tower, but without any damage to the wall itſelf; for the tower being much higher than the wall, it tumbled down without drawing any part of the wall after it.

Titus ſupports the machines.

The Jews having for ſome ſhort time intermitted their ſallies, the Romans took it to be either out of fear or wearineſs; and ſo went their way careleſly up and down the works and camp as in a ſtate of ſecurity. But the Jews taking notice of this from the town, and how the Romans were ſcatter'd and out of order; they made a furious excurſion upon them out of a ſally-port from the tower Hippicos; ſet fire to their works, and, in the heat of this ſucceſs, puſh'd the beſiegers back to their very camp. The alarum paſſed immediately through the whole army, and the Romans far and near drew preſently together to the relief of their companions: but the daring hardineſs of the Jews was not yet able to ſupport itſelf againſt the diſcipline of the Romans. They over-ran at firſt all that they met withal; attacking thoſe that they found in a body: but the heat of the conflict was about the engines; how to burn them on the one ſide, and to ſave them on the other. The air was torn with uncertain outcries from both parts: and this encounter upon the ſhock, coſt many a brave man his life. But the Jews were much the bolder and the more adventurous of the two. The fire had by this time laid hold of the machines: and they had certainly been deſtroy'd with all that belong'd to them, if they had not been ſupported by a choice party of Alexandrian troops; who behav'd themſelves that day to a miracle, and had a great ſhare in the honour of the action.

The Romans worſted by a ſurprize. And beaten to their camp.

A party of Alexandrians puts a ſtop to the purſuit, and recovers the honour of the day.

These troops gave the Jews a ſtand; till the general himſelf, with a brave body of horſe, broke in upon them. He cut down twelve men with his own hand, and drove the reſt before him into the city. This exploit was the saving of the engines.

THERE was a Jew taken alive upon this encounter; whom Titus ordered to be crucify'd in sight of the walls, to try how far such an exemplary terror might work upon them. But for all this, after his departure, one John, an Idumean officer, as he was talking with a soldier of his acquaintance before the walls, was shot with an arrow quite thorough the heart by an Arabian, to the great grief of all that knew him, Jews and Zelotes; having the reputation of a worthy man to all purposes, both for wisdom and valour.

CHAP. VIII.

A tumult occasion'd by the fall of a tower in the night. The Jews fear nothing else. The ram made the first breach. The Jews quit the first wall, and betake themselves to the second. They make several bold sallies. The discipline of the Romans is too hard for the hot-headed rashness of the Jews. The Jews are proof against all hardships. Simon's men had a strange veneration for their master. A glorious action of Longinus.

A terrible tumult in the Roman camp, occasion'd by the fall of a tower.

THE next night there happen'd a most dreadful tumult in the Roman camp. Titus had order'd the raising of three towers, of fifty cubits in height, to be erected upon three several ramparts; so as to have the command of the town wall. In the dead of the night one of these towers fell of itself down to the ground; with so dreadful a clatter, that the surprize frighten'd and alarm'd the whole army. The Romans could not tell what to make of it; but ran presently to their arms, and put all the legions into a confusion, and uproar. Some fancy'd the Jews were attempting something against them: some, in fine, surmising one thing, some another; till they came in the end (no enemy appearing) to have a jealousy one of another, and every man to demand the WORD of his next neighbour, with the same formality and strictness as if the Jews had been in possession of the camp. They lay under the consternation of this panick terror, till Titus had learnt out the whole matter, and made the truth of it publick by proclamation over the whole camp. This, with much ado, put an end to that confusion.

The Jews stand firm against all difficulties but the towers.

THE Jews all this while cheerfully sustained all other difficulties, but that of the towers; which was in truth not to be disputed or avoided. From those turrets they were gall'd with all sorts of machines, by archers, slingers, &c. and no remedy. For first it was impossible for them to carry up their platforms to the height of these towers; and then they were too strong and too heavy to be over-turn'd: and there was no burning of them neither; for they were all plated over with iron. So that all the Jews had to do, was to get out of the reach of the Roman darts, arrows, and stones, without making any opposition to the force of the rams; which, by little and little, and the shock of repeated strokes, in the conclusion did the work. The Romans had one terrible machine, which the Jews called Nicon, or the Conqueror; and it was this ram that made the first breach. The besieged were by this time so spent with watching and fighting (having been upon duty all night) that betwixt levity and ill advice, they came to an agreement among themselves to quit the first wall; having two other yet to trust to. Upon this, they retir'd, and the Romans mounted the breach that Nicon had made: and after that opened the gates to the whole army; the Jews being all withdrawn to the second wall. It was now the seventh * of the month Artemisius, when the Romans made themselves masters of the first wall: the greater part of it they destroy'd; and so likewise the north quarter of the town, which Cestius had ravaged before.

The ram, or that which they call the Nicon, made the first breach.

The Jews quit the first wall, and withdraw to the second.

TITUS being now remov'd to a place they call'd the Assyrians camp, possessed himself of all betwixt that and the valley of Cedron; somewhat more than a bow-shot from the second wall: resolving from thence to begin his attack; which he went in hand with immediately. The Jews posted themselves orderly upon the wall, and made a gallant resistance. John and his companions commanded in the fortress Antonia, and the north-side of the temple from the sepulchre of Alexander. Simon and his party maintain'd the passage from the monument of John the high-priest, to the gate by which water is convey'd to the tower of Hippicos. The Jews made several desperate sallies, and came many times to a close fight with the Romans, hand to hand; but the Roman discipline was too hard for the unskilful temerity of the Jews, and beat them back with loss: only upon the walls they had the better of them. The Romans had both fortune and conduct on their side; but the Jews supported themselves by a boldness resulting from despair, and by a natural hardness against either fatigue or danger. And it is farther to be consider'd, that the Jews fought for life and safety, the Romans for speedy victory: and they were neither of them to be tired out; for approaches, assaults, sallies, forlorns, and combats of all sorts, were their daily exercises. They began at the dawn of day, and so continued till night parted them: when both sides were kept waking; the one for fear of their walls, the other for fear of their camp; all night in arms, and the next morning by day-light ready for a battle. The Jews valu'd themselves so much upon the contempt of death, and hazards, that they made an emulation of it who should dare most, as the only way to ingratiate themselves with their superiors. Such was the fear and reverence they had for Simon, that all and every man that he had about him, would have dy'd at his feet, if he had but said the word; nay, and have been their own executioners too. Now for the Romans, they were so wonted to victory that they did not know what it was to be overcome. So that they needed no other encouragement to do bravely, than experience and success: beside, that war was familiar and habitual to them, by

They make several bold sallies.

The Roman discipline too hard for the brutal temerity of the Jews.

The Jews are proof against all manner of fatigues or dangers.

A strange veneration that Simon's men had for their master.

the continual exerciſe of arms in the ſervice of a glorious empire; which with the preſence and aſſiſtance of a martial prince, over all the reſt, could not but inſpire them with a more than ordinary courage. What could be more infamous than cowardice, with a martial emperor for a witneſs of it? or what more charming on the other ſide, than the honour and reward that naturally follows great actions, in the bounty and eſteem of Ceſar? This ardour and ambition of men's ſignalizing themſelves, tranſported ſeveral heroical ſpirits, 'tis true, into the attempt of things extravagant, and beyond their force.

A glorious action of Longinus.

THERE was at this time a ſtrong body of the Jews drawn up before the walls, and they were come already within diſtance of exchanging blows and lances with the Romans. In this inſtant of time, one of the Roman horſemen (Longinus by name) ſpurr'd into the middle of the enemy's army; where he killed two of the beſt men they had: one of them, as he was coming to engage him, he ſtruck thro' the jaws with his lance, and he ran the other thorough the body afterward with the ſame weapon; coming off to his party at laſt without a wound. He made himſelf famous by this action, and provoked others to a generous emulation of following his example. The Jews all this while were ſo intent upon doing miſchief, that they never heeded what they ſuffer'd; and reckon'd upon death as nothing, if they had but one life in exchange for another. But Titus had an eye upon the ſaving of his men, as well as the gaining of a victory, and look'd upon the heats of an inconſiderate raſhneſs, but as another ſort of deſperation: neither would he allow any exploit for true valour, that was not govern'd by caution and prudence, and with the leaſt danger to his men, and the moſt to his enemies.

Caſtor, a bold, a crafty, and a treacherous Jew. He deſires a treaty, and Titus embraces the motion. The whole ſtory a cheat from firſt to laſt. Caſtor makes an eſcape from the very flames. Miſtaken mercy is cruelty.

Caſtor and ten more with him lay cloſe behind the battlements.

A bold, a crafty, and a treacherous Jew.

Caſtor deſires a treaty.

THE ram being now pointed againſt the middle of the tower on the north-ſide of the city, Titus pour'd in ſuch ſhowers of arrows upon the defendants, that they all quitted their poſts: only one ſly crafty Jew, whoſe name was Caſtor, and ten of his people with him, lay skulking behind the battlements. But when they had lain ſtill a-while, they felt a ſhock that made the tower ſtagger under them. Upon this, they got up; and Caſtor, in the language, poſture, and tone of a ſupplicant, addreſs'd himſelf to Titus for quarter, and begg'd to be ſpar'd. Titus was ſo good-natur'd as to fancy the Jews had now enough of the war, and ſo put a ſtop both to the battery and the archers; telling Caſtor at the ſame time, that if he had any thing to ſay, he was ready to hear him. Caſtor made anſwer, that there was nothing he deſir'd ſo much as a treaty. With all my heart, ſays Titus; and if all your companions be of the ſame mind, I am ready to grant you your pardon. Upon this offer, five of the ten pretended to join with Caſtor; the other five cry'd out, that ſo long as they might die free, they would never live ſlaves. During this diſpute, there was nothing farther of hoſtility. But Caſtor in the mean time ſends privately to Simon, to make the beſt of his time, and to conſider what was to done, and leave it to him to illude the Roman general a-while, under the pretext of adviſing his companions to a peace. Caſtor acted his part ſo to the life, that there were ſwords drawn upon it, blows given, and men ſeemingly kill'd: but the whole ſtory was a cheat.

Titus accepts of the motion.

Five of the ten divide; one half ſeemingly for it, and the other againſt it.

The whole ſtory a cheat from firſt to laſt.

TITUS, and thoſe about him, were all amazed at the inflexible obſtinacy and boldneſs of the Jews; and not without a compaſſion for their miſery: but being upon the lower ground, they could not ſee ſo diſtinctly what was done above. While this paſs'd, Caſtor was wounded with an arrow near his noſtrils; who preſently drawing it out, held it up to Titus, as an appeal to him for juſtice. This prince reſented the injury to ſuch a degree, that he bad Joſeph (ſtanding next to him) go to Caſtor from him, and give him all aſſurances in his name of amity and fair quarter. Joſeph begg'd his excuſe, and not only declin'd going himſelf, but diſſuaded his friends alſo that would have gone; telling them, that this pretended ſubmiſſion was nothing but treachery. But one Eneas, however, a deſerter to the Romans, would needs be venturing for all this; eſpecially upon Caſtor's invitation; who bad him bring ſomewhat along with him to put a ſum of money in, that he intended to preſent him. Eneas was forward enough to go upon theſe terms; and had no ſooner put himſelf in a poſture to receive the preſent, but Caſtor dropp'd a great ſtone down from the wall, which Eneas had much ado to avoid; but it wounded the man that ſtood next him. This treachery gave Titus to underſtand the danger of unſeaſonable good nature; and that a ſteady rigour is the beſt defence againſt fair words and plauſible pretenſions. So that to revenge himſelf upon Caſtor and his companions, for the affront they had put upon him, he betook himſelf to his batteries again with greater violence than before. When Caſtor and his people found the tower tottering, and juſt ready to ſink under them, they put fire to it; and ſo made their eſcapes into a vault thorough the very flames. This exploit gave them a mighty reputation among the Romans, for men of reſolution and courage; upon an opinion, that in this action they were no other than * devotees.

Caſtor makes his eſcape thorough the very flames.

TITUS made himſelf maſter of this part of the wall within five days after the taking of the firſt: and now finding the way open to the ſecond wall, he drove out the Jews before him, and with a thouſand choice men entered the town, among the clothiers, braſiers, saleſmen, and all the croſs narrow paſſages up to the wall. Now if Titus had immediately broken down the greater part of of this wall, as by the laws of war he might have done; the victory would have coſt him little or nothing: but conſidering the miſerable neceſſities of the Jews on the one hand, if they ſtood it out, and the ſecurity of their retreat on the other hand, if they had a mind to be gone; Titus relented yet once again, in confidence that they would better bethink themſelves, and never imagining that they could be ſuch ungrateful monſters, as to be treacherous to a man that had taken ſo much care for their preſervation.

Miſtaken mercy is cruelty.

CHAP. X.

Titus a prince of tenderneſs and humanity. The ſpite and malice of the factions. A ſharp fight, and the Jews get the better of it. Titus recovers the day. The Romans get the ſecond wall, and loſe it again. The famine a greater calamity than the war. The ſecond wall holds out three days; and Titus maſters it upon the fourth.

TITUS being now entered the town, would not ſuffer ſo much as one priſoner to be kill'd, or one houſe to be burnt: and he was ſo fair to the faction themſelves too, that if they had a mind to fight it out, he left them at liberty ſo to do; provided only that they ſhould not force and oppreſs the people. He promis'd the inhabitants alſo at the ſame time, to maintain them in their lawful poſſeſſions, and to give them back again what had been taken from them. Theſe propoſals were generally acceptable; ſome deſiring the city might be ſpar'd for their own ſakes, others that the temple might be ſpar'd for the city's. But this humanity and tenderneſs was all imputed by the faction, to the want of courage in the general: for Titus, they ſaid, had only offer'd theſe conditions, becauſe he deſpair'd of ever winning the other part of the city; the faction threatning death at the ſame time, to any man that ſhould but open his mouth for a peace or a treaty. The Romans were no ſooner got into the town, but the Jews annoy'd them all manner of ways; by blocking up the narrow paſſes, galling them from the houſes, and forcing the guards by ſallies from the walls to quit their towers, and retire to the camp. Never was ſuch a confuſion and outcry as betwixt the ſoldiers within the town, in the middle of their enemies, and thoſe without the town, for fear of their companions within. The Jews being both more in number, and better acquainted with the by-ways and ſecret paſſages than the Romans, they were too hard for them upon all encounters: and the breaches not being wide enough to march out many abreaſt, they were ſo put to it in the croud, that, if Titus had not come in juſt as he did, ſcarce a man of them had got off. But upon ſetting a body of archers at the end of every ſtreet; and Titus poſting himſelf ſtill where there was moſt danger, with Domitius Sabinus for his ſecond (a brave man upon the main, and one that did wonders in that action) they held the Jews in play with their darts and lances, till they brought off their men, under the cover of that diverſion. Thus were the Romans, after the gaining of the ſecond wall, beaten out again.

The humanity and tenderneſs of Titus.

The malice and calumny of the faction.

A ſharp fight, and the Jews too hard for the Romans.

Titus recovers the day.

The Romans gain the ſecond wall, and loſe it again.

THE reſolute part of the citizens had the vanity to flatter themſelves, upon this ſucceſs, into an opinion, either that the Romans would never dare to look them in the face again; or if ever it ſhould come to a battle, that they themſelves were invincible. Now if theſe wicked men had not been judicially infatuated, they would have conſidered, that the Romans, whom they had lately repulſed, were but a ſmall handful, to the vaſt numbers they were yet farther to encounter: to ſay nothing of the famine that ſtill encreaſed more and more upon them every day. For the publick ruin ſerv'd hitherto only for the nouriſhment of theſe people, and the blood of the citizens for their drink. Good men, in fine, fell into great neceſſities; and not a few dy'd, even of famine itſelf: but the loſs of theſe people was ſome ſort of conſolation to the faction; and they only wiſh'd well to thoſe that would have a war with the Romans. As to the reſt, they look'd upon them only as an uſeleſs unprofitable burden to the publick; and this was the kindneſs they had one for another.

A famine worſe than the war.

THE Romans made another attempt to recover the wall again, which they had gotten and loſt; and for three days ſucceſſively, without intermiſſion, they ply'd the aſſault with one attack upon the neck of another, and were as valiantly repulſed. But on the fourth day, Titus gave ſo furious a charge, that they were not able to ſtand it any longer: and upon this puſh, he got poſſeſſion of the wall, demoliſhed the northern part of it, and immediately placed gariſons in all the towers to the ſouthward.

The ſecond wall ſtands it out three days, and Titus carries it the fourth.

CHAP. XI.

Titus victuals and prepares for action. He tries council and argument as well as force. Joſeph harangues the Jews. A ſtarving famine in the city. Inſtances of God's providence toward the oppreſſed: as in the caſe of Pharaoh Nechao, the Egyptian bondage, the plagues of Egypt, the Aſſyrians taking the ark, Sennacherib's mighty army, Jeruſalem deſtroy'd by Zedekiah, and the ſtory of Antiochus Epiphanes. God is merciful to the penitent. Joſeph's generous reſignation. The miſeries of the famine. Jeruſalem was effectually burnt by the Jews.

TITUS's heart was now ſet upon ſtorming the third wall; but not looking upon it as a work of time or difficulty, he bethought himſelf of trying what might be done by gentler methods towards the reducing them again to their duty and their reaſon; in hope that, betwixt force and famine, they might be prevailed upon to hearken to better counſels: for their booty and proviſion was well nigh ſpent on the one hand, and Titus in as much eaſe and plenty as his heart could wiſh on the other: inſomuch, that upon a day of general muſter, Titus order'd his troops to be drawn up and paid in ſight of the enemy; the foot advancing with their ſwords drawn, and the led horſes ſo gloriouſly capariſon'd, that the whole field ſparkled with gold and ſilver. Nothing, in fine, could have been a more agreeable charming ſight to the the Romans, or a more terrible one to the Jews; who were gotten in ſwarms together upon the old wall, on the north-ſide of the town: beſide that the houſes were all crouded, and the whole city cover'd with people, gazing at the bravery of this pomp: which was ſuch, in ſhort, that it ſtruck a damp into the very boldeſt of the factious Jews, and would, in all probability, have brought them over to the Romans, if they had not been conſcious to themſelves of having committed too many unpardonable outrages againſt the people; beſide that it was certain death on the other hand, to give over the diſpute. So that they rather choſe to die like men of honour by the chance of war, than tamely by a butchery. But the fates had ſo order'd it, that the innocent were to fall with the guilty, and the city itſelf with the faction.

Titus ſpends four days in victualling his camp; and on the fifth prepares for action.

When Titus, after this, had paſs'd away four days in victualling his camp, without any act of hoſtility, he divided his army upon the fifth day into two bodies; and finding no diſpoſition in the Jews to a peace, he fell to caſting up of works againſt the fortreſs Antonia, near John's monument, in hope of gaining the upper town from that quarter, and then making himſelf maſter of the temple from Antonia: for without taking the fort, the city, though taken, could not be maintain'd. Againſt each of theſe two places, he advanced two attacks, and poſted a legion at every mount to cover the workmen. They that wrought next the monument, were galled by the Jews, and by Simon's people; and the other againſt Antonia were yet harder put to it by John's party, and his bands of Zelotes; who had both the higher ground, and the advantage of their machines, an engine which by daily uſe and practice they were now come perfectly to underſtand. They had three hundred croſs-bows, and forty ſlings for ſtones, which very much annoy'd the Romans, and put a check to the progreſs of their deſign.

He tries perſuaſion and advice, as well as force.

Titus did ſo far preſume upon his fortune, that he reckon'd the town as good as his own beforehand; but ſtill, however, as he ply'd the ſiege on the one hand, he did not forget to make trial of perſuaſion and advice, as well as force, to bring the Jews to reaſon, on the other. And conſidering, that words in many caſes are of greater efficacy than arms, he made it firſt his own requeſt to the Jews to conſult their own ſafety, by ſurrendering the city into his hands, which he could make himſelf maſter of at pleaſure; and then left the reſt to Joſeph, upon an opinion, that the humanity of ſuch an office from the lips of their own countryman, and in their own language, might probably find better ſucceſs. Joſeph, in purſuance of Titus's commiſſion and appointment, took a walk about the town; and at laſt, making a ſtand upon a riſing ground, within hearing of the enemy, and out of reach of their ſhot, he deliver'd himſelf to them in words to this effect.

Joſeph harangues the Jews.

I AM now to beſeech you, my dear friends, ſays Joſeph, as you love your lives and liberties, your city, your temple, and your country, let your tenderneſs appear upon this occaſion, and learn to be merciful to yourſelves from your very enemies and ſtrangers. The Romans, you ſee, have ſo great a veneration for holy things, that they make a conſcience of laying violent hands upon any thing that is ſacred, and without pretending to any part, or intereſt in the communion: whereas, inſtead of defending the religion you were brought up in, you are engaged here in a direct conſpiracy to deſtroy it. Do you not ſee that your ſtrengths are all beaten down already, your weakneſſes expoſed, and your walls defenceleſs; and that in this condition it is morally impoſſible for you to hold out any longer againſt ſo formidable a power? neither is it a new thing, in caſe of the worſt, for the Jews to be ſubject to the Romans. It is a glorious cauſe, 'tis true, when liberty is the queſtion; provided it be early enough, and before that liberty is either forfeited or loſt; but for people to talk of ſhaking off the yoke, after they have once ſubmitted to it, and continued in that obedience till they became ſlaves by preſcription; this is not the way to live free, but rather to die with infamy. It would be a ſcandalous bondage indeed, to ſerve a maſter that a man of honour would be aſham'd to own; but it is another caſe to be ſubject to a people that have the whole world at their feet. As, where's that ſpot in the univerſe, that has eſcaped the dominion of the Romans; ſaving only where extreme heats or colds have rendered the place intolerable and uſeleſs? Fortune is effectually gone over to them; and the great diſpoſer of empires himſelf, hath in his providence at preſent made Italy the ſeat of the univerſal monarch. Beſide, that it is according to the ſovereign law of nature, that governs in beaſts, as well as in men, to give way to the ſtronger, and to ſubmit to the longer ſword. This was it that made your anceſtors, though in power and politicks much your ſuperiors, to pay an allegiance to the Romans: which they would never have done, if they had not been thoroughly convinced that it was God's will to have it ſo. But to what end is it for you now to diſpute a point any longer, that's as good as loſt already? for if the walls were yet entire, and the ſiege rais'd, famine alone would do the work. It has begun with the multitude, and the ſoldiers turn will be next; and every day ſtill worſe than other: for the calamity is inſuperable, and there is no fence againſt hunger. Wherefore, you ſhould do well to bethink yourſelves in time, and to take wholeſome advice before it be too late. The Romans are naturally a generous enemy, and ready to forgive and forget all that's paſt; provided you do not carry on the affront to an unpardonable extremity. They are not a people to ſacrifice their intereſt to their revenge, and to charge themſelves with the incumbrance of a depopulated city, and a deſolated province; but rather for receiving you with open arms into their friendſhip. But if ever you come to be taken by ſtorm, you muſt expect to be put to the ſword every man of you; thoſe eſpecially that, in defiance of the emperor's grace and mercy, ſhall continue obſtinate to the laſt. And for your third wall, what have you to look for from it, but the fate of the other two that are gone before? or what if your works were abſolutely impregnable?

A pinching famine in the city.

pregnable? the very want of bread, as I told you, would do the office of the ſword, and ſubdue you to the Romans.

While Joſeph was thus reaſoning the matter with them, they return'd him only bitter and contemptuous reproaches from the walls, for his good-will; and not without darts and ſtones to accompany their revilings: ſo that when he ſaw they were not to be wrought upon, either by admonition, or by affliction, he betook himſelf to the hiſtory of former times, for precedents and arguments to his preſent purpoſe.

Several inſtances of God's providence in favour of the oppreſſed.

Ah! miſerable and unthankful wretches that you are, ſays he, to forget your beſt friends, and to encounter the Romans with carnal and common weapons, as if the victories you have formerly obtained, had been the effect of your own wiſdom and virtue! Can you ſay, that God, the great creator of heaven and earth, ever failed of protecting the Jews when they were oppreſs'd? Will you never be wiſer? Do but conſider whence you come, where you are, and what you are a doing; and how glorious a protector it is that you provoke by theſe outrages. Why do you not call to mind the divine exploits of your illuſtrious anceſtors, and the wonderful deliverances that God hath wrought for them by the ſacredneſs of this holy place? It gives me a horror to think of expoſing the hiſtory of God's miraculous diſpenſations to a people ſo unworthy of the bleſſing; but yet, upon this occaſion, I ſhall diſpenſe with that ſcruple, to ſhew you that the war you are now engaged in, is not ſo much againſt the Romans, as againſt God himſelf.

The cauſe is rather God's cauſe, than the Romans.

Pharaoh Nechao.

Pharaoh Nechao, a king of Egypt, carry'd away with a mighty army, Sarah, the queen and mother of us all. Now you would have thought perhaps that Abraham, the huſband of Sarah and our common father, having at that time the command of three hundred and eighteen lieutenants, and troops innumerable under them, ſhould have attempted the righting of himſelf by arms: but he choſe rather to lie quiet; offering up his prayers toward this holy place which you have polluted, to implore God's aſſiſtance. And what came of it, but the king's ſending the queen back again untouch'd to her husband, the ſecond night after ſhe was taken away; the Egyptian in the mean while, contracting a veneration for the place, which you have defiled with the blood of your countrymen; till in the end, finding himſelf haunted with frightful dreams and viſions, he poſted away back again into his own country; but firſt ſcattering large donatives of gold and ſilver among the people, in token of the reverence he had for a nation ſo much in God's favour.

The Egyptian bondage.

What ſhall I ſay now of our predeceſſors tranſporting themſelves into Egypt; their four hundred years bondage under a foreign tyranny, and their ſubmitting with patience and reſignation to God's good pleaſure, even at a time when they were ſtrong enough to have redeem'd themſelves by force! To tell you now how the Egyptians were infeſted with ſerpents, and tainted with all manner of diſeaſes; how the fruits of the earth were blaſted, the Nile corrupted, and ten plagues immediately ſucceeding one another, would be no more than what every body knows: but thoſe of our anceſtors that God had deſign'd to the prieſthood, were conducted out ſafe and ſound, without either blood or danger, under the guard of a ſpecial providence.

The plagues of Egypt.

The Aſſyrians taking the ark.

And ſo when the Aſſyrians forced away from us the holy ark, how did Paleſtine, Dagon, and the whole nation that was concerned in it, rue the ſeizure of it! Their guts became putrid and rotten, and the pain of the gripes intolerable; inſomuch, that their bowels and their excrements came away together. And what was the end of it, in the concluſion, but the bringing of the ark back again to us with the ſound of muſical inſtruments, and with the ſame ſacrilegious hands that took it away, to expiate in ſome degree for the wickedneſs! This was the work of God himſelf in favour of our anceſtors, for caſting themſelves entirely upon his providence and mercy, without having any recourſe to common means.

Sennacherib's mighty army.

And what became of Sennacherib the king of Aſſyria, and his prodigious army, when he ſat down before this place, accompany'd with the whole ſtrength of Aſia? was he cut off by the arm of fleſh, or any human power? No. But when the Hebrews were peaceably and quietly at their prayers, the angel of God confounded in one night that army: and the Aſſyrian found a hundred and eighty five thouſand of his men dead upon the place next morning, the reſt flying in a fright from the unarmed Hebrews, that had no thought of purſuing them.

The captivity of Babylon.

You know likewiſe that our people were ſeventy years captives in Babylon, without making any attempt toward the recovery of their liberty, till God put it in the heart of Cyrus to diſcharge them, and to diſmiſs them into their own country; where they began to offer ſacrifices again to God, as their only deliverer and preſerver. But to be ſhort, What great thing did our forefathers ever bring to paſs, either with arms, or without, but by God's particular direction, and aſſiſtance in the execution of his orders? If they ſtay'd at home, they were victorious without fighting; it being God's pleaſure that it ſhould be ſo: and when they fought in a confidence of their own ſtrength, they never ſucceeded. As for inſtance; when the king of Babylon laid ſiege to this city, our king Zedekiah gave him battle contrary to the advice of the prophet Jeremy; and what was the event of it, but the routing of his army, the taking of Zedekiah priſoner, and the deſtruction both of city and temple before his face? Do but obſerve the difference now betwixt the moderation of that prince and people, and of yours. The prophet told them plainly, that they were fallen under God's diſpleaſure for their wickedneſs; and that, if they did not deliver up the city, it ſhould be forced from them by aſſault: and yet for all this foreboding, neither prince, nor people, offer'd him any violence. To ſay nothing now of what paſſes within your walls; (an iniquity, in truth, not to be expreſs'd) I ſhall only take notice how barbarouſly I myſelf have been treated by you both in words and actions: and what's my crime, I beſeech you, but the honeſt liberty of telling you your faults, and adviſing you for the beſt? But you have not patience to hear the very ſtory of your own daily practices.

Jeruſalem deſtroy'd by Zedekiah.

The caſe of Antiochus Epiphanes.

IT was much the ſame caſe too, when Antiochus, called Epiphanes, laid ſiege to this city. Our forefathers, having many ways incurred God's high diſpleaſure, preſs'd the enemy to a battle, without waiting for his divine direction and aſſiſtance: The Jews were totally defeated, the town taken and pillag'd, and the ſanctuary, for three years and ſix months, wholly abandon'd. In few words, what was it but the ſtubborn crotchneſs of our own people that firſt irritated the Romans againſt the Jews? Whence are we to date our ſlavery, but from our own ſeditious countrymen; when the two factions of Ariſtobulus and Hyrcanus, in an ambitious heat of competition, brought Pompey into the city, and made the Jews that were unworthy of liberty, ſlaves to the Romans? When they had held it out three months, they render'd the place; though in a much better condition to defend it than you are, and infinitely ſhort of what you are in tranſgreſſing and prophaning the laws and religion of our country. We all know what was the end of Antigonus the ſon of Ariſtobulus; in whoſe reign, the Jews were puniſh'd with another judicial captivity for the ſins of the people. And did not Herod the ſon of Antipater likewiſe beſiege Jeruſalem with the aſſiſtance of Soſius a Roman general, and at the head of a Roman army? After ſix months the town was reduc'd, and ſack'd by the enemy, as the juſt judgment upon the party for their iniquities.

HERE is enough ſaid to ſhew that this way of arms and ſieges, hath been ever fatal to our brethren; and that the end of ſuch a war would be certain ruin. And therefore it ſeems reaſonable to me, that thoſe that are in poſſeſſion of this holy place, ſhould entirely remit themſelves to the conduct of God's providence; who will never be wanting to them that ſerve him, and keep his commandments. But you for your parts lead your lives in a direct oppoſition to his holy will, in leaving undone what you are commanded to do, and in doing what you are forbidden. How much have you more to anſwer for, than thoſe that you have ſeen taken off by a vindictive juſtice in the career of their wickedneſs! As for the ſecret ſins of theft, fraud, treachery, and adultery, you look upon them as trifles, and not worth the ſpeaking of. But you value yourſelves upon oppreſſion, murder, and other ſins of the firſt magnitude, that were hardly ever heard of before. Nay, and you have made the holy temple itſelf the ſcene of your wickedneſs; a place ſo ſacred, that the Romans themſelves have a veneration for it, notwithſtanding the inconſiſtencies of their religion with ours. And yet this place, that the very Romans have ſo great a reverence for, is polluted and blaſphem'd by thoſe who have been train'd up to the temple worſhip. With what face now can you pretend to expect aſſiſtance from a power that you have ſo impiouſly provok'd? But you take it for granted that you are juſt, humble and righteous; and your hands as clean as our king's were, when he ſtretch'd them out to implore ſuccour from heaven againſt the Aſſyrian, and when the return of his prayer was, the next night, the utter ruin of the enemy's army. Now if you will have it that the Romans behave themſelves as the Aſſyrians did, you may expect that God will deal with them after the like manner: But this is quite another caſe: for the Aſſyrian compounded for a ſum of money to ſave this city; and then broke his oath, and ſet fire to the temple: whereas the Romans only demand a yearly tribute; and no more neither than what our fathers pay'd to their fathers. Let this be made good to them, and the temple and city have nothing to fear: but you ſhall enjoy your families, your liberties, and your eſtates; with the free exerciſe of your religion, and under the regulation of your own laws. You muſt be mad to imagine that God will treat tyrants and murderers, and men of moderation and juſtice, all alike; eſpecially when puniſhment and vengeance are but the work of a moment to the Almighty.

THE Aſſyrians, you ſee, were deſtroy'd the firſt night they came before the town; and if it had been the will of God to ſet the one free, and to chaſtiſe the other, he would have pour'd down his wrath upon the Romans, as he did upon the Aſſyrians: either when Pompey firſt forced Jeruſalem; or Soſius, after him; or when Veſpaſian harraſs'd Galilee; or now at laſt upon the attack of Titus. But neither Pompey, nor Soſius, met with any ſignal oppoſition from heaven; and they both ſucceeded in their enterprizes upon the place. As for Veſpaſian, he advanced himſelf to the empire upon the credit of the war he made upon us. And what do you think of almoſt a miracle, wrought in favour of Titus? Siloa, you know, and other fountains without the city, were drawn ſo low before Titus came hither, that water was hardly to be got for money; but ſince his arrival here, the ſprings are grown ſo full again, that there is ſufficient for the Romans, to all manner of purpoſes: and not only for themſelves, and their cattle, but for the gardens too. The ſame thing happen'd at the time when the king of Babylon, before mentioned, march'd up to Jeruſalem with his army; took the town and city, and laid them both in aſhes: now this prodigy was the forerunner of that ruin and conflagration. Not that I take the wickedneſs of thoſe days to have been comparable to that of the preſent age: but it looks as if God had abandon'd his own houſe and people in favour of the enemy. Make it the caſe now of the maſter of the houſe, and a vicious and debauch'd family. If he be a virtuous man, he'll ſhift his quarter, and never endure to be under the roof with that ſort of people. How can you imagine then, that God will countenance your abominations? an all-ſeeing God, that ſearches the privacies of your hearts, and reads your thoughts in their very conception? But alas! you have no privacies at all, no reſerves; but make your very enemies the confidents of all you do. You live in a kind of competition who ſhall be the lewdeſt, and value yourſelves upon an oſtentation of your wickedneſs.

God is merciful to the penitent.

BUT God is not inexorable to thoſe that confeſs their miſdoings, and truly repent; which is the courſe that you muſt take, if ever you hope for mercy. Wherefore caſt away your arms; let your hearts bleed for the judgments you have brought upon your country. Do but look well about you, and conſider the ſweetneſs of the place, the glory of the city, and the majeſty of the temple that you are now about about to betray, with the ineſtimable maſs of treaſure that is there depoſited, in donatives, and oblations from all parts of the world. Can any man have the heart now to think of expoſing theſe magnificent curioſities to fire and pillage? or of ſeeing thoſe excellencies deſtroy'd, which of all things under the ſun are beſt worth the preſerving? If you were not harder, and more inſenſible than ſtones, this reflection would move you; or, if nothing elſe will work upon you, bethink yourſelves of your parents, your wives, your children, and your families, that are at this inſtant upon the brink of periſhing, either by famine or by the ſword. It will be ſaid perhaps, becauſe I have a wife of my own, a mother and a family, (of ſome credit formerly) concern'd in the common hazard, that it is for their ſakes, and my own intereſt, that I give this council. But if either the ſacrificing of their lives, or mine, or both, may conduce to your ſafety, I am ready to deliver them up all, upon condition that you will be wiſer, and honeſter, when we are gone.

Joſeph's generous reſignation for the good of the country.

THIS diſcourſe of Joſeph drew tears from his own eyes; but the factions were not one jot ſoften'd with it, neither did they judge it ſafe at any rate to cloſe with the Romans: but, on the contrary, the common ſort were ſtagger'd at it, and made it their buſineſs too, how to ſave themſelves by flight. To this end, they ſold what they had that was valuable, though at eaſy rates, and ſwallow'd the gold for fear of being robb'd upon the way: by which means they ſupply'd themſelves with neceſſaries when they got over to the Romans; Titus, in the mean time, leaving the ſtragglers at liberty to go whither they would. And this diſcharge was ſtill a greater encouragement to their eſcape; for they got clear of the city broils without being ſlaves to the Romans. But John and Simon, and their companions, clapt a ſtrict guard upon the paſſes, and took as much care to keep the citizens from going out, as the Romans from coming in: ſo that the leaſt ſuſpicion, or pretence of a ſuſpicion, was enough to take away any man's life that they thought fit to ſuſpect. And it was all one to the rich whether they ſtay'd or attempted to fly: for they that had any thing to loſe, were ſure to fall under a jealouſy; and that jealouſy was death.

THE rage of the faction, and the pinch of the famine encreaſed daily; and when there was no corn any longer in ſight, they broke open houſes for it. If they found any upon the ſearch, the owners were ſeverely handled for denying it; or, if none, they were put to the torture to diſcover their ſtores. Nay, they drew inferences of guilt from the very bodies of the miſerable; and to be hail and ſound, was made an argument of private ſtores and plenty. The conſumptive were diſpatch'd out of hand; though no need, one would think, of putting them to a violent death, who were ready to die for want of bread. There were ſeveral of the better ſort that ſold all they had in the world for a buſhel of wheat; and others of the poorer, for the ſame proportion of barley: and then ſhutting up themſelves, with their purchaſe, in ſecret hiding-holes, ſome fell to feeding on the corn without grinding, and ſome again ſtay'd the baking of it; according as they were more or leſs preſs'd by hunger or danger. There was no ſuch thing as the ceremony of ſetting or ſpreading a table; but happy was he that could ſnatch a bit from the coals betwixt raw and roaſted. Never ſo miſerable a calamity, or ſo lamentable and horrid a ſpectacle; where the ſtrongeſt ſtill far'd beſt, and the weaker had nothing more to do than to bemoan their misfortunes: ſtarving being certainly of all deaths the moſt deplorable, as it takes away all ſenſe of *ſhame, tenderneſs, and reſpect. Wives forc'd away the meat out of the very mouths of their husbands; children did the like by their parents; and what was yet more barbarous, mothers by their infants; taking away from them, as they lay languiſhing in their arms, the very laſt ſupport of life: and this could not be done ſo privately neither, but ſome body or other was ſtill at hand to take away that from them again which they had taken from others. Wherever they ſaw a houſe ſhut up, they concluded there was eating in that houſe; and preſently forcing the doors, they tore the meat ready chew'd out of the very throats of the people, juſt as they were about to ſwallow it, though to the hazard of choaking them. They had no mercy either for age or ſex; but beat the old men that offer'd to defend what proviſion they had got, and dragg'd the women by the hair, for endeavouring either to keep or to conceal any thing. Neither did ſucking children eſcape any better; but they were torn away from the mother's breaſts, and daſh'd againſt the ground: ſo that infancy and grey hairs had the ſame quarter. There could hardly be a more unpardonable affront, when any of theſe freebooters were abroad upon adventure, than for him that was purſu'd to outrun his purſuer, and to eat his own bread before the other could come up. They ſpar'd for no manner of cruelty, provided they might but get ſomething to ſtay their ſtomachs: as the putting of people to exquiſite pains in their private and moſt ſenſible parts; thruſting up pointed ſticks into their bodies, and other ſuch like torments, not to be mentioned without horror: and all this for the diſcovery, perhaps but of one ſingle loaf of bread, or an handful of flour that they had conceal'd. And their tormentors were not hungry neither; for the tyranny would have been more pardonable, if they could have pleaded neceſſity in their excuſe. But this was purely a wanton piece of inhumanity, when they were victualed themſelves with ſix days proviſion before-hand. Some poor wretches, that had given the Roman guards the ſlip, and crept out of the town by night for herbs and ſallad, had the ill hap to fall into their hands when they thought themſelves out of all danger; where they were ſtripp'd of all they had, and glad at laſt, after a thouſand importunities and prayers, only for part of their own again, for which they had run ſo great a hazard, to compound for their lives. This was the treatment they receiv'd from the common ſoldiers; but perſons of quality were carry'd to the uſurpers themſelves: ſome of them put to death for treaſon, and a deſign of betraying the city to the Romans, upon the teſtimony of falſe witneſſes;

and this was ſtill one of the articles, that they had a mind to go over to the enemy. Thoſe that Simon had pillag'd were carry'd to John, and John's priſoners to Simon, as if they had been quaffing healths one to another, and ſharing their carcaſſes betwixt them. They were divided, in fine, who ſhould be uppermoſt; but perfectly well agreed in the methods of their tyranny and uſurpation. They went halves in their robberies, and he was reckon'd the greater knave of the two that cozen'd his companion of any part of his moiety in the booty, to which they were both equally entitled.

IT would be endleſs to run through the hiſtory of their iniquities; but to comprize all in a little, I am verily perſuaded, that there never was ſo miſerable a city, or ſo barbarous a people, upon the face of the earth: in fine, the better to palliate their inhumanity to ſtrangers, they revil'd the very nation of the Hebrews, and own'd themſelves (as in truth they were) for a company of ſlaves and ſcoundrels, vagabonds and baſtards. In the concluſion, they laid the city in rubbiſh and aſhes; nay, and the burning of the temple was effectually their act too, both in the haſtening of it, and by the forcing of Titus, even againſt his inclination, upon thoſe extremities. As the upper town was in a flame, the Romans gave many inſtances of a generous compaſſion, (as will be ſeen hereafter) but not ſo much as a ſigh, or a tear to be heard of among the Jews. But of this farther in its proper place, with remarks upon the whole matter.

The burning of the city was their own act.

The Jews miſerably tortured and crucify'd. Titus ſevere in his own defence. Scandals caſt upon the Romans. The Jews hard and reſolute. The Romans raiſe four mighty works. The Jews ſet fire to the bulwark. Simon attempts the other mounts. A brave action of three Jews. The Romans beaten from their works. Death without mercy for a Roman to quit his poſt. A bloody fight upon mounting the engines. Titus begins to deſpair of carrying his point.

TITUS, all this while, ply'd his works daily; but not without loſs of men from the walls. It was the Jews practice to ſteal out the night, and look abroad for proviſions; and not without ſome ſoldiers among them, that could not get wherewithal in the city to anſwer their neceſſities. Theſe people were moſt of them poor, and durſt not deſert for fear of having their wives and their childrens throats cut that they left behind. Neither durſt they take their families along with them for fear of diſcovery. Titus being aware of theſe difficulties, ordered out a detachment of horſe to way-lay the Jews in the vallies. Hunger had made them deſperate, and ſo venturing out, they fell into the enemy's ambuſhes. When they found themſelves beſet, they were than forced to fight upon neceſſity, for fear of ſome puniſhment worſe than death itſelf; beſide that it was now too late to think of begging quarter. In ſhort, they were maſter'd; and after expoſing them to all manner of tortures, they were crucify'd in the ſight of the beſieged. Titus was not at all pleas'd with the ſeverity of this rigour; eſpecially conſidering there did not paſs a day wherein they did not take at leaſt five hundred Jews priſoners: but he did not find it ſafe, either to diſcharge ſo many obſtinate priſoners that he had now at mercy, or to ſpare men enough to look after them from the ſervice of the army: beſide the hope he had, that the terror of ſuch an example might move them to bethink themſelves, leſt it ſhould come to be their own caſe. They were all crucify'd, but in ſeveral ways and poſtures: ſome, to expreſs their rage; others, their hatred; and ſome again, their mockery and contempt: but the number of the priſoners was ſo great, that they wanted room for more croſſes, and croſſes for the bodies. And ſo far was the horror of this execution from ſoftening the faction, that, as they ordered the matter, it wrought a clear contrary effect by the help of this invention. The friends and relations of the fugitives, and thoſe that had but the leaſt inclination to a peace, were dragg'd out to the walls, to ſhew them what they were to truſt to that went over to the Romans; poſitively maintaining all the while, that the men they ſaw in chains were not priſoners of war, but deſerters, that ſued for mercy. This device kept a great many from deſerting, till the truth came to be known; though ſome there were that immediately ſlipt away to the enemy to avoid ſtarving, which they look'd upon as incomparably the more miſerable death of the two.

Titus forced upon ſeverities in his own defence.

Priſoners of war they pretend to be deſerters that could get no quarter.

TITUS, upon this, cauſed ſeveral of his priſoners hands to be cut off, and ſo ſent them away to John and Simon, in ſuch a plight, that they might neither look like deſerters, nor be taken for ſuch; adviſing them at the ſame time to put an end to the war, without forcing him upon the deſtruction of the city; for it was not yet too late, upon a ſeaſonable ſubmiſſion, to preſerve their lives, their country, and their temple, entirely to themſelves. But Titus advanc'd his works all this while; quickening and encouraging the workmen, being reſolved very ſuddenly to follow his words with effects, and to gain his point by force, which he could not compaſs by reaſon and perſuaſion.

THE Jews, in the mean time, caſting out a thouſand curſes from the walls, againſt both Veſpaſian and Titus, declared one and all their contempt of death, and how much their liberties were dearer to them than their lives: and that, provided they might plague the Romans, they car'd not what became either of themſelves or of their country; which Titus told them, were in danger to periſh. And as for their temple, they look'd upon the world to be much the more magnificent ſtructure of the two; or however, they made no doubt but God would take care of his own houſe; and upon him they depended for protection, in deſpite of all their threatnings, which God would never ſuffer to take place. This was the ſubſtance of their outragious and unmannerly reply.

The obſtinate malice and reſolution of the Jews.

ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes was by this time come up, attended with a train of armed troops; having one company, among the reſt, of ſtout young fellows for his guard, all about the ſame age; accoutred and train'd up after the Macedonian way; from whence they took the name of Macedonians: not for their birth, neither did the greater part of them anſwer the character of that people. Of all the princes that were ever ſubjected to the Roman empire, the king of Camagena was undoubtedly the moſt proſperous and ſucceſsful, for the former part of his life; but in his latter days his fortune forſook him, and verify'd the old ſaying, "That "no man is to be pronounc'd happy before his "death." He had a ſon of a martial enterprizing ſpirit; of a robuſt body, and bold to the degree of raſhneſs. This ſon of his was ſaying one day, that he wonder'd the Romans ſtood trifling before the walls at that rate, and did not rather puſh it to an attack. Titus anſwer'd him with a ſmile, that the way was open to any man that had a mind to't. The word was no ſooner out, but Antiochus led up his Macedonians to the aſſault, and gave proof both of his valour and conduct in the management of the action: but his followers however were almoſt all of them kill'd, or wounded; having made ſuch boaſts before-hand what wonders they would do, that they could not in honour quit the undertaking. This gave the young men to underſtand, that the Macedonian courage would never do the buſineſs without Alexander's fortune: ſo that they were forc'd to quit the attempt, and bring off the remainder of their men as well as they could.

The Romans raiſe four mighty works in ſeventeen days.

IT was upon the twelfth of the month * Artemiſius, that the Romans began the platforms formerly mention'd; and upon the nine and twentieth that they finiſh'd them, after ſeventeen days hard labour; for there were four of them in all, and they were mighty works. There was one toward Antonia, that was rais'd by the fifth legion, over againſt the middle of the Struthian pool: there was another caſt up by the twelfth legion, within twenty cubits of the former. The tenth legion, (which was more conſiderable than the other two) threw up another work to the north, over againſt the pool call'd Amygdalon; and at thirty cubits diſtance from the laſt was a fourth mount, erected by the fifteenth legion, not far from the monument of John the high-prieſt.

THESE works were no ſooner up and perfected, but John cauſed a mine to be wrought under that which look'd toward Antonia, and ſeveral wooden props to be ſet up all along the trench, to keep the weight of the earth above from falling; dawbing the wood-work with a bituminous matter that would take flame immediately. So that John had now no more to do, but to ſet fire to the pillars; which when the props were gone, brought down the whole bulwark with a moſt hideous noiſe. There was no fire to be ſeen at firſt, but only a ſmothering duſt and ſmoke, till the flame at laſt broke thorough all oppoſition, and ſhew'd itſelf. This was ſo aſtoniſhing a ſurprize to the Romans, that it put them to their wits end to receive ſuch a baffle, when they made themſelves ſure of their point. Neither was it to any purpoſe to think of quenching the fire, when their ramparts were gone.

Simon attempts the other mounts.

IT was but two days after, this that Simon and his people made an attempt upon the other mounts; where the Romans had already planted their rams, and began to batter. There was one Jeptheus of Garſis, a city of Galilee; Megaſſarus, a domeſtick of queen Mariamne's; and one of Adiabena, the ſon of Nabateus, who from a misfortune he had was called Agiras; which ſignifies lame: theſe three men, with torches in their hands, flew directly to the machines; and breaking through the enemies troops, with no more concern than if they had been among their friends, ſet fire to them; and in deſpite of all oppoſition, with darts and arrows, they purſu'd their deſign till their engines were all in a flame. Theſe were reputed three of the braveſt men that appear'd in that war.

A glorious action of three Jews.

UPON the mounting of the fire, the Romans diſpatch'd away a detachment from the camp to the relief of their companions; but the Jews, in the mean time, pour'd their ſhot upon them from the walls; and without any regard to their own lives or perſons, fought it out hand to hand with thoſe that were endeavouring to put a ſtop to the fire. The Romans did all they could to ſave their rams; the covers of them being conſumed already: and the Jews ventur'd into the very flames to hinder them; and would not let go their hold, though the iron-work of them was burning hot. The fire paſſed from thence to the ramparts; and there was no help for it. Upon this, the Romans finding themſelves encompaſſed with flames, and no hope left them of ſaving the works, withdrew into their camp. The Jews had ſo many enforcements out of the city, that the encreaſe of their number made them more and more preſſing and inconſiderate: inſomuch, that in the heat of their ſucceſs, they advanced to the very camp itſelf, and attack'd the guards. Now the office of theſe guards, according to the rule of the Roman diſcipline, was to do duty by turns, and relieve one another; and not a man of them, upon pain of death without mercy, to quit his poſt, under any colour whatſoever. Theſe people having this charge before-hand, either to fall like men of honour, or to ſuffer an infamous death as deſerters, they made a generous reſiſtance, and brought ſeveral of thoſe back again, betwixt neceſſity and ſhame, that had abandon'd their ſtation; and with their engines, put a ſtop to the excurſions of the Jews from the city. They made their ſallies without any guard or defence for their own ſecurity; fighting all they met, at a venture, and caſting themſelves like madmen upon the very points of the enemies pikes, and falling in pell-mell among them. The Jews, in fine, gain'd more upon the Romans by a raſh hardineſs, than by pure courage: and the Romans, on the other hand, gave way rather to the ourageous boldneſs of the Jews, than for the apprehenſion of any miſchief they could do them.

Death for a Roman to quit his poſt.

TITUS, at his return from Antonia, where he had been to find out a commodious ground for advancing his attacks, gave the ſoldiers a ſevere rebuke, for ſuffering themſelves after the gaining of the enemy's works, to be diſtreſs'd in their own, and in a manner beſieg'd by thoſe that were no better than priſoners themſelves. Titus, upon this, with ſome of his choice troops, ſurrounded the Jews, and charged them in the flank; while they, on the other ſide, maintain'd their ground with a wonderful reſolution. Upon the engagement of the two bodies, it rais'd ſuch a duſt and clamour, that there was nothing diſtinctly to be either ſeen or heard; and neither friend nor foe to be known aſunder: neither were the Jews thus obſtinate out of any confidence in their own ſtrength, but out of deſpair of ſafety; while the Romans were ſo enrag'd, on the other ſide, betwixt the nicety of military honour, and the paſſion they had for the perſon of the emperour, which was then in danger, that if the Jews had not retreated into the town juſt as they did, they had undoubtedly been all cut to pieces: but ſtill the loſs of their bulwarks went to the heart of the Romans; and to find it the work but of one hour to deſtroy what had been ſo long a raiſing. This diſappointment, together with the diſmounting of their engines, put them out of all hope of ever gaining the place.

Titus in deſpair of gaining his point

CHAP. XIII.

Titus conſults a council of officers. Some for puſhing it to a battle; ſome for making good the ramparts; others for intercepting proviſions. Titus orders the running up of a wall: The courſe and compaſs of it; and this wall finiſhed in three days.

Titus calls a council of war.

WHILE things were in this poſture, Titus call'd a council of his chief officers to adviſe him what to do. Some warm men among them were of opinion for a general aſſault, and falling on with the whole army; for there had been nothing done as yet they ſaid, but in-ſkirmiſhes, and parties; and if it came once to a main battle, the Jews would never be able to ſtand the dint of the very darts and arrows. The more conſiderate part were for renewing and repairing their ramparts; others for having no works at all, but only watching the victualers, and keeping the city from proviſions; and ſo committing the reſt to the famine, which would do the buſineſs of the ſword without ſtriking a blow. There is no beating of people out of their reſolution that have a mind to die. Now Titus, 'tis true, thought it diſhonourable to lie ſtill at the head of a formidable army, altogether without action; and to fight with a people ſo bent upon their own deſtruction, a great piece of folly and imprudence. As for the erecting of new works, he found it morally impracticable for want of materials; and ſo, for the watching of all paſſengers, to ſecure the avenues; for it was not a thing to be done, in regard both of the compaſs of the town, and the difficulties of the places: or, if the high-ways were all block'd up, the Jews would yet find out other private conveyances in caſe of neceſſity; and by the advantage of knowing all the ſecret paſſages, leading to and from the city; ſo that if the Jews ſhould find out means of conveying relief into the city by ſtealth, it would but protract the ſiege, and leſſen the honour of the victory by the delay. Or let it be granted now, that all this may be done, and the reputation of the Romans, together with the ſafety of the army, be provided for, both in one, diſpatch is yet to be prefer'd to glory: but the ſure way to do the thing at laſt, with caution and expedition, muſt be by running a wall quite round the city. By this means all excurſions will be prevented, and the Jews either forc'd to deliver up the place in the depth of their deſpair, or weaken'd by the pinch of their neceſſities, into an incapacity of defending themſelves: whereas otherwiſe, the diſpute will be endleſs. "But this "ſhall not hinder me, ſays Titus, from giv- "ing orders for the repairing the works; eſ- "pecially when the weaker part of thoſe that "are left, are already ſufficient to put a ſtop "to the courſes of the enemy. This may be "look'd upon perhaps as a project of inſuper- "able difficulty; but if it had been leſs, it "would not have ſtood with the dignity of "the undertaker: neither are great things to "be brought about without labour, but by "the more immediate aſſiſtance of an Almigh- "ty power."

Some for repairing the ramparts. Others for no ramparts at all, but rather for intercepting proviſions.

TITUS made an end of what he had to ſay, with an order to his officers immediately to ſet about the erecting of this wall, and to enter upon it with a regular diſtribution of the whole army into their proper ſtations. The word was no ſooner given, but the ſoldiery were all tranſported by a kind of divine impulſe into a generous emulation of outdoing one another: for after the meaſuring of the ground, and the dividing of the legions, the ſame ſpirit of competition ran through the whole body. The common ſoldiers with their ſerjeants, the ſerjeants the like with their captains, the captains with their colonels, the colonels with their lieutenant-generals, and all in ſubordination to Titus; who was ſo intent upon his buſineſs, that he never miſs'd a day of taking a round and viewing the whole work.

Titus orders the erecting of a wall about the town, and diſpoſing the whole army into their proper ſtations.

TITUS began this wall at a place called the Aſſyrians camp, where he himſelf had his quarter. He carried it forward to the lower Cenopolis, and ſo by the way of Cedron to mount Olivet, which he enclos'd on the ſouth as far as the rock Periſtereon; together with a neighbouring hill that overlooks the vale of Siloah. From thence he turn'd his point a little to the weſtward, and ſo on to the valley of the fountain. He took his way next to the ſepulchre of Ananus the high-prieſt; and ſo encloſing the mountain where Pompey had formerly encamp'd, he return'd to the northward, and paſs'd on to a village called Erebinthonicus; took in Herod's ſepulchre toward the eaſt, and there joined one end of the wall to the other where he began.

The courſe of the wall.

THE compaſs of this wall was nine and * thirty furlongs; thirteen forts built on the outſide of it, and every fort ten † furlongs about. But the moſt incredible part of the ſtory was the finiſhing of an encloſure in three days, which might well have taken as many months. Upon the perfecting of this work, there were guards poſted in all the forts, that did duty every night under their arms. Titus went the firſt round himſelf, Tiberius Alex-

CHAP. XIV.

The miserable distresses of a devouring famine. The Romans make ostentation of their plenty, to enflame the envy of the Jews. Four ramparts raised at Antonia larger than the former.

The dismal ravage of a devouring famine.

THE shutting up of the Jews in the town put them to the utmost degree of despair; for the famine was now so outrageous, that it swept away whole families. The houses were strew'd with the carcasses of women and children, and the narrow lanes with the bodies of old men that lay dead there; young men walked the streets like so many ghosts. There was no such thing as burying the dead: some wanted strength to do the office; others wanted will, as being discouraged, partly by the great number of them, and partly in regard they did not know but their own turn might be next. Some there were that expir'd themselves in the very act of burying others; and some again hastened away to their graves before their time, to make sure of a resting place while they were yet living. And yet in the depth of all this misery, there was not heard so much as one groan or outcry; but all other passions were stifled in the pain of a tormenting hunger. Those that dy'd last, stood gazing with dry eyes, and ghastly looks, upon those that were out of their pain before them. The city was all wrapt up in a profound silence, and heaps of dead bodies piled together up and down in the night. But the most deplorable part of the story, was the insolence and brutality of the free-booters: insomuch that the famine itself was nothing to it. They broke into houses, which at that time were no better than charnel-houses; stript the dead to their very skins, and then made themselves sport with their nakedness; trying the temper of their swords upon the bodies of the miserable wretches as they lay half dead. If any man called for a hand or a sword, to dispatch him out of the way, and deliver him from the misery of the famine, he was repulsed with an insensible cruelty and neglect. As they came to the point of death, they still clos'd their eyes toward the temple; and it went even then to the hearts of them to leave these wretched miscreants yet among the living, that had so lewdly prophan'd that holy place. When they were now no longer able to endure the putrid corruption of the dead bodies, order was given to have them all interred at the publick charge: but for want of room to dispose of them, these impious monsters cast them down head-long from the walls into the vallies; which was so horrid a spectacle, that Titus, upon taking the round of the place, finding the ditches so filled and annoyed with rotten carcasses and pestilential vapours, stretched out his hands to heaven in an appeal to Almighty God, that he had no hand in making it so. This was the state and disposition of the city at that time.

WHILE the faction was now so coopt up within their walls, that there was no stirring out of the town; beside the double mortification they endur'd of famine and despair; the Romans at the same time, pass'd their days merrily, and at ease, in an abundance of all sorts of necessary provisions, out of Syria, and the neighbouring provinces; insomuch that several of the Romans, out of an invidious ostentation of their stores, came up to the very walls, to irritate and insult the wants on the one side, with exposing the plenty on the other. But all wrought nothing upon the insensible hearts of the seditious; insomuch that Titus, in pure compassion to the remainder of a miserable people, resolved to go on immediately with casting up new works afresh, and hastening the dispatch as fast as he could. The only difficulty was the providing of wherewithal to carry it forward; for the wood near the city was all cut down already for the former works and destroy'd, so that they were now forced to fetch all their timber for a second supply at ninety * furlongs distance from the place; and there were four ramparts erected at the fortress Antonia larger than the former. Titus lost no time, and having the faction now at mercy, he gave them to understand as much. But they went on still without the least sign of remorse, and with as little regard to their own bodies and souls, as if they had been the bodies and souls of other people: for the dead they tore to pieces like dogs, and choak'd up the sick and languishing in prisons.

The Romans make an ostentation of their plenty, to reproach the Jews in their extream necessities.

Four ramparts erected at Antonia, larger than the former.

CHAP. XV.

Matthias recommends Simon to the city. Simon murders him in requital, by the hand of Ananus the worst of men. Ananias put to death. Judas in a plot to destroy Simon. Simon surprizes the town. Joseph wounded, and reported to be kill'd. Titus rescues him, and he recovers. The Jews swallow their gold. Two thousand of their bellies ript up in one night. Titus transported at so horrid an outrage. The love of money is the strongest of all appetites.

WHEN Simon had first put Matthias to the torture, he put him afterwards to death; and this was the requital he made for getting him admitted into the city. This Matthias was the son of Boethus, a priest, in high esteem with the people, and no man generally better belov'd. The Jews were hardly used (it seems) by the Zelotes; and upon John's joining with them, Matthias moved the calling in of Simon to their assistance; but without any caution, or conditions, or any bargain before-hand whatsoever, not apprehending any treachery from him. Simon had no sooner made himself master of the town, but he treated Matthias as one of the greatest enemies he had, and imputed the advice he gave for the opening of the ports, to gross simplicity, and over-sight: so that upon this, he was arraign'd and accus'd for holding intelligence with the Romans, and a sentence of death pass'd upon the father, and his three sons, (the fourth having made his escape to the Romans) without ſo much as hearing what he had to ſay for himſelf. The only favour this venerable old man had to deſire of Simon, in return for the obligation of letting him into the town, was, that he himſelf might die firſt; but Simon refuſed that grace, and commanded the father to be laſt executed, to keep him ſo much the longer in pain. Matthias, in the concluſion, was put to death upon the bodies of his ſons, and in the ſight of the Romans, according to Simon's order to Ananus, the ſon of Bamadus, the moſt inhuman miſcreant Simon had about him. Neither did he content himſelf barely to execute the deteſtable ſentence; but in a frolick of inſolence, and deriſion, when he was juſt upon the point of ſtriking the ſtroke, "You would "fain have gone over to the Romans, ſays "he to Matthias, and let them bring you off "now if they can." But in ſhort, to conſummate the inhumanity, the bodies were all refuſed burial, by the ſpecial command of Simon himſelf.

Simon in requital puts Matthias to the torture, and then murders him upon the bodies of his three ſons.

Ananus, the vileſt of men, the executioner.

THERE was alſo Ananias a prieſt, the ſon of Masbalus, nobly deſcended; and Ariſteus, a native of Ammaus, and ſecretary to the council; who, with fifteen more of the principals of the people, were all put to death. The father of Joſeph was alſo made a priſoner, with a proclamation upon it, that no man ſhould preſume to come at him upon pain of treaſon. Nay, it was made death alſo, without either trial or mercy, but ſo much as to pity them.

Ananias put to death, and Joſeph's father made priſoner.

IT fell out after this, that Judas, the ſon of Judas, an officer of Simon's, and a commander of one of the turrets, lamenting the brutal oppreſſion of a miſerable people, and alſo not forgetting in the firſt place his own preſervation, took an occaſion to confer with half a ſcore of the truſtieſt friends he had, upon that ſubject. "How long, ſays he, are "we to crouch under the burden of this ty-"ranny, or what hope of ſafety is there in "the ſervice of ſo falſe, and ſo cruel a maſ-"ter! We have ſword and famine to encoun-"ter, and the enemy as good as within our "walls already; Simon, of all men living "the moſt ungrateful. We live in a perpe-"tual fear of puniſhment from him; and the "Romans, on the other hand, are moſt cer-"tainly men of faith and honour: ſo that we "have no more to do, but to deliver up the "walls, and to preſerve ourſelves, and our "country, both in one. Neither has Simon "any cauſe of complaint, only he ſuffers a "little ſooner."

Judas the ſon of Judas in a plot to deſtroy Simon.

WHEN the ten men were come to an agreement, Judas betimes ſent the remainder of his people ſeveral ways, for a blind to his deſign; and about the third hour of the day, called out to the Romans from the turret, and gave them to underſtand the reſolution they had taken: ſome gave no heed to it; others no credit; and ſome again thought it not worth their while to maſter a place they might get without danger. By this time Titus had drawn ſome troops up to the wall; but Simon, having got intelligence of the deſign, immediately ſurpriz'd the turret; and killing the guard, in the very view of the Romans, tumbled the bodies down the wall. While Joſeph was walking up and down there, and doing the Jews the beſt offices he could by his interceſſion and advice, it was his fortune to be knock'd down with a ſtone from the battlements: whereupon the Jews made a deſperate ſally, and had carry'd him off a priſoner, if Titus, in that inſtant, had not ſent a party to his reſcue. During this skirmiſh, they got away Joſeph, before he was well come to himſelf again. The faction took it to be as they wiſh'd it; and mightily overjoy'd they were in the belief that Joſeph was ſlain. The rumour paſs'd for current through the city, and put the inhabitants into a diſmal conſternation, for the loſs of their mediator and patron among the Romans. The tidings of Joſeph's death being brought to his mother in priſon, ſhe told her guards that ſhe heard as much, and that ſhe ſhould never ſee him more. Upon this occaſion, the women condoled with her; and ſhe herſelf deploring her own misfortune, that in bearing a ſon, who, ſhe hop'd, would have bury'd the mother, ſhe was not now in condition to pay thoſe funeral rites to her ſon. But the mother was not long the worſe, nor the faction long the better, for the miſtake of a falſe report. For the danger of Joſeph's wound was quickly over; and upon returning to his poſt again, he gave them all to underſtand, that, in a ſhort time, they ſhould pay dearly for what they had done: but ſtill animating the people all along to return to their obedience. The ſight of Joſeph put his friends in countenance again, and caſt as great a damp upon the hearts of the faction.

Simon ſurprizes the town.

Joſeph wounded with a ſtone, and ſaid to be kill'd.

Titus reſcues him, and he recovers.

IN this extremity there were ſeveral deſerters went over to the Romans: ſome leapt the wall, and made their eſcape that way; others got off under a colour of attacking the enemy with ſtones. But inſtead of avoiding one calamity within the town, they fell into a worſe without; and the ſurfeits they contracted in the camp, were much more mortal than the famine they left at home. For being empty with a long famine, and puffed up with a dropſical diſtemper, they could not come to their eating again, but by little and little, without danger of burſting: and the moſt miſerable part of the ſtory is yet behind.

THERE was a fugitive ſurprized among the Syrians, in the very act of ſearching for gold, that had been ſwallow'd, and paſſed thorough him, as I ſaid before: now the faction put all people to the ſcrutiny; and there was ſuch plenty of gold in the town, that twelve * Atticks at preſent were as much worth as five and twenty heretofore. The fame of this diſcovery was preſently all over the camp, and that the Jews who deſerted had conceal'd gold in their guts: whereupon, the Arabians and the Syrians ript up two thouſand of their bellies in one night for their treaſure: which I take to have been the moſt barbarous butchery the Jews ever ſuffer'd.

The Jews carry off gold in their guts.

Upon this report two thouſand of their bellies were ript up in one night.

* Admitting (which is moſt probable) that the author here means an Attick drachme, the value of twelve in ſilver amounted to ſix ſhillings and ten pence half farthing, and in gold to five pound nine ſhillings and ſix pence; and of twenty five in ſilver to fourteen ſhillings and three pence, and in gold to eleven pounds eight ſhillings and three half-pence Engliſh money. This valuation is made from Dom Calmet's tables, whom in theſe affairs we have chiefly follow'd, tho' it is the loweſt that has been made by any author; ſome, of good authority, having valued them at near one ſeventh higher.

TITUS

Titus tranſported to the higheſt degree.

TITUS was ſo tranſported at the brutality of this action, that he had certainly order'd his horſe to ſurround them, and put every man of them to death with darts, that had a hand in it, if the number of the guilty had not been ſo much greater than that of the ſlain. Hereupon he called his officers together, as well Romans as auxiliaries, and finding ſeveral of his own people concern'd in the outrage, he enter'd into an angry expoſtulation with them upon the whole matter. "Is it poſſible, ſays he, to "the Romans in the firſt place, that any ſoldier "of mine ſhould be guilty of ſo unmanly a "cruelty, for a doubtful and uncertain ad-"vantage, and not bluſh at the thought of ſo "infamous and ſcandalous a purchaſe?" And then again to his auxiliaries. "Can you "think it reaſonable, ſays he, that the inſo-"lencies, the murders, and the inhumanities "of the Syrians and Arabians, in a foreign "war, where they take all manner of licence, "ſhould be imputed to the Romans, and "the malice of the one laid at the others "door?"

Now Titus could not altogether excuſe his own people, and was ſo tranſported at it, that he threatened death without mercy to any man that ſhould preſume to commit any of thoſe outrages over again: appointing the legions alſo at the ſame time, to make a ſtrict ſearch after all ſuſpected perſons, and he himſelf would have the hearing of the cauſe. But avarice will ſtand all hazards. Beſide that, cruel people are naturally covetous, and the love of money is the moſt inſatiable of all appetites. Fear and precaution, 'tis true, in ſome caſes may be brought to hear reaſon: but when a people are given up once to a ſpirit of reprobation, the ordinary ways and means of ſecurity turn to their deſtruction: and what Ceſar ſo ſeverely prohibited in publick, was nevertheleſs executed upon the Jewiſh deſerters in ſecret. Only their cuſtom was, upon any fugitives coming over, firſt, to make ſure that none of the Romans ſhould be within ſight, and then cut up the Jews bellies for the execrable booty: and when they had done, they found little more, in fine, than vain hopes. This horrid practice however frighted the Jews out of their deſertions, and greatly reduced the number of them who were already come over to the Romans.

The love of money the moſt powerful of all appetites.

From plunder John advances to ſacrilege.

WHEN the pillage fail'd, John advanced to ſacrilege; ſeizing to his own uſe ſeveral donatives and oblations, with divers neceſſary veſſels for the ſervice of God's worſhip; as cups, diſhes, tables, &c. to the very pieces that Auguſtus, and the empreſs, dedicated to the honour of the holy temple; which the Roman emperors had ever a great veneration and eſteem for, though a Jew, at that time, had prophan'd it, and ſtript it of the very bounties of ſtrangers; encouraging his companions to take all manner of liberty with holy things: "For it was but reaſon, he ſaid, "that they, who fought for the temple, "ſhould live by't". So that he made no ſcruple of diſtributing among the people the holy wine and oil, that was reſerv'd in the inner part of the temple for ſacrifices: and as John made the diſtribution, the multitude took their parts of it, drinking, and anointing, without any difficulty. My heart is full, and I cannot forbear giving it vent. I am perſuaded, that if the Romans had delay'd the calling of theſe wicked people to an account, this city would either have been drown'd, or ſwallow'd up with an earthquake, or have been deſtroy'd with thunder and lightning, like Sodom; the Jews being much the wickeder people of the two: inſomuch, that for their ſtubbornneſs and iniquity, the whole race of them was rooted out.

The race of the Jews rooted out.

IT would be endleſs to recount the ſeveral inſtances of their miſery. Manneus, the ſon of Lazarus, had the command of one of the city gates; and going over to Titus, he gave him this account: that from the time of Titus's encamping before the town (from the fourteenth of * Xanthicus to the firſt of Panemus) there paſs'd thorough that gate one hundred thouſand fifteen hundred and eighty dead bodies, and this was no more than what fell to his ſhare to take notice of, by virtue of a commiſſion to that purpoſe: beſide what were bury'd by their relations; that is to ſay, thrown out of the city, having no other way of burial. After this, upon the computation of divers men of quality that deſerted, there were ſix hundred thouſand poor people carry'd out of the gate; beſide others innumerable, that for want of friends to carry their carcaſſes out of the city, were pil'd in heaps, and ſhut up in large houſes. Wheat was by this time valued at a talent † a buſhel; and now ſince the walling up of the town ſo cloſe, that they were cut off from all proviſion, to the value of a ſingle ſpire of graſs, they were brought to that pinch of extremity, that they were glad to rake vaults and ſinks for ſuſtenance, and to feed upon ox-dung, and other naſtineſs, enough to turn a body's ſtomach but to look upon it. The bare ſtory of the calamity drew pity from their very enemies; but the faction in the city, that both ſaw and felt their ſufferings, were not ſo much as ſenſible that their own rebellious obſtinacy had been the cauſe of it. But they were hurried on, under the fatality and impulſe of a blind infatuation, to the irreparable ruin both of themſelves and of the city.

Six hundred thouſand dead bodies carry'd out of the city.

* From the fourteenth of April to the firſt of July.

† The value of a Jewiſh talent in ſilver, which we ſuppoſe to be the talent here meant, amounted to three hundred and forty two pounds three ſhillings and nine-pence of Engliſh money.

The ſtate of Jeruſalem. From a civil war they advance to a foreign. A paradiſe turn'd into a deſart. The Jews outdo the Romans. They attempt the firing of their engines, but fail. Jeruſalem aſſaulted. The Jews make a bold defence. The Romans fall to mining. Titus to his army. The Jews firm in all extremes. Titus's opinion of a future ſtate. An encouragement to his ſoldiers to do their duty. A gallant action of Sabinus.

The ſtate of Jeruſalem.

THE ſtate of Jeruſalem was every day worſe and worſe; and the faction ſtill more and more fierce and turbulent, as they grew more and more miſerable: the famine having now taken poſſeſſion of great and ſmall, all alike. It was a ſad ſpectacle to ſee how the ſtreets were cover'd with dead bodies, the air infected, and the very paſſages choak'd up with carcaſſes that were trampled under foot like the ruins of a fought field; and without any conſideration either of terror or pity, or how ſoon it might come to be their own caſe. They began with cutting one another's throats, and advanced from a civil war to a foreign; as if divine providence had not made haſte enough to perfect their deſtruction. For they did not contend ſo much for any hope they had of victory, as in a tranſport of rage and deſpair.

From a civil war to foreign

THE Romans, upon this pinch, were hard put to it for materials to finiſh their works; but yet, upon cutting down all the woods within ninety furlongs of the city, they made a ſhift in one and twenty days to raiſe their platforms. But never was known ſo diſmal a change of things, from a paradiſe to a deſart; and, inſtead of the moſt delicious country under the heavens, for curious gardens, plantations, and houſes of pleaſure, not ſo much as a tree or a cottage left ſtanding, or any thing to be ſeen but the marks of deſolation and ruin: inſomuch that ſtrangers could not forbear weeping, to ſee the difference betwixt the old Jeruſalem and the new. For the war had ſo far defac'd the beauty and the glory of the place, that it was hardly to be known again; and people enquir'd for Jeruſalem in the very heart of the city itſelf.

A paradiſe turn'd into a deſart
Not a ſtick of wood left within ninety furlongs of the town.

UPON perfecting the mounts, the Jews and the Romans were both equally ſolicitous for the event. The Jews were either to deſtroy them once again, or to loſe the city, and one diſappointment more on the other hand would put the Romans out of condition to repair them: for there was no more wood to be gotten, and the ſoldiers were quite harraſs'd out with the fatigue of the ſervice. Not but that the Romans all this while, were more afflicted for the calamity of the city, than the citizens for themſelves; who kept up their courage yet in deſpite of all difficulties. But when the Romans found themſelves over-reach'd by ſtratagem, their inventions eluded, the wall proof againſt their machines, and themſelves worſted, in fine, at handy-ſtrokes, their very hearts fail'd them; eſpecially having to do with an enemy, that inſtead of ſinking under the diſcouragements of faction, famine, war, &c. rather gather'd ſpirit from the oppoſition. "What would not theſe people do, ſaid the "Romans, if they had fortune on their ſide; "that behave themſelves with this bravery, "in defiance of all oppoſition!" Upon this conſideration,

The Jews too hard for the Romans.

" conſideration, the Romans doubled their " guards.

They attempt the firing of the Roman engines, but fail.

JOHN and his people in the caſtle of Antonia, did all that was to be done, before the rams were mounted, to prevent the danger of a breach. But it was ſo much labour loſt, for the deſign they had of ſetting fire to the mount with flaming torches, came to nothing. The truth of it is, they did not behave themſelves like Jews, either for union or vigour, and ſo were forc'd upon a retreat. But as they fell ſhort of themſelves, on the one ſide, ſo the Romans alſo went beyond themſelves on the other, in planting ſo ſtrict a guard on the bulwarks, that there was no poſſibility of doing any execution by fire: beſide, that they were reſolv'd every man of them to die upon the ſpot, rather than to ſubmit to ſo irreparable a miſchief as the loſing of that poſt; for nothing could have put the ſoldiers in a greater confuſion, than to ſee brave men outdone by policy, their courage baffled by a hot-headed temerity, military diſcipline and experience confounded by popular outrage, and the Romans, in fine, overcome by the Jews. While the Jews advanc'd, the Romans were ready with their darts to encounter them; and the foremoſt that fell did not only hinder his next man, but the exemplary danger of the one, ſerv'd for a warning to the other. As for thoſe that preſs'd upon the enemy's weapons, ſome of them were ſurpriz'd at the dignity of the Roman order, others at their numbers, and ſome again march'd off with their wounds: ſo that in the concluſion, they all quitted their ground, every man ſhifting the blame off to his fellow.

They blame one another.

Jeruſalem aſſaulted.

THE aſſault was given on the firſt of the month * Panemus; and the Jews being now drawn off, the Romans advanced with their rams toward Antonia, in defiance of all they were able to do, by fire, ſword, ſtones, and all other ways of hoſtility whatſoever. Not but that the Jews depended much upon the ſtrength of their walls againſt the battery of the machines: but they did what they could however to keep the Romans at a diſtance from fixing them. The inference they drew from this way of management was, that the Jews were conſcious to themſelves that Antonia was in danger, and that this apprehenſion made them beſtir themſelves ſo much. They continu'd the battery, and the wall ſtood hitherto firm; but the Romans fortifying themſelves under the defence of their bucklers againſt the ſhot and ſtones from above, they apply'd themſelves to digging and mining; and when, with indefatigable labour, they had looſen'd four ſtones under the foundation of the work, the night drawing on, they betook themſelves on both ſides to their reſt. In this interim, that part of the wall that John had undermin'd for the deſtruction of the former works, fell down all on a ſudden. This unexpected accident was a ſurprize to both parties. The Jews, that had reaſon to be troubled at it, eſpecially when they might have foreſeen and prevented it, were yet in as good heart as if Antonia had been their own ſtill: and the joy of the Romans, on the other hand, for an accident that appear'd ſo ſeaſonable, was as quickly daſh'd upon the ſight of another wall, that John had carry'd up within the former; only the latter appear'd to be the leſs defenſible place of the two, both as the ruin of the one facilitated the paſſage to the other, and as the work of the new wall could not yet be ſo firm and ſettled as that of Antonia. But there was no thought of ſcaling it, and coming off alive.

The Jews make a bold defence.

The Romans fall to mining

TITUS was not now to learn the force of reaſoning, and fair words, upon the minds of men of arms and honour; or how generous ſpirits might be wrought upon by plauſible inſinuations of artifice and addreſs, into not only the neglect of danger, but the very contempt of death itſelf. With this thought in his head, he ſummoned the flower of his army together, and ſpake to them after this manner:

Titus to the flower of his army.

" My brave fellow-ſoldiers, ſays he, there " can be no place for encouragements, where " there is no danger: neither would it become " me to offer it, as if you wanted it, or you " to take it. Exhortations are more properly " for doubtful caſes, wherein all brave men " will adviſe themſelves. It will be a hard " work, I muſt confeſs, to maſter the wall " we have here before us: but great ſouls are " given us for great and glorious exploits; and " death is an advantage when it is follow'd " with immortal fame for a reward: beſide " that it ſhall be my care to reward thoſe " that deſerve it. In the firſt place, I would " have you think of that for your encouragement, that works a contrary effect upon o- " thers. I ſpeak of the inſuperable patience " and conſtancy of the Jews in the worſt of " fortunes. As what can be more ignomi- " nious, than for the military Romans, that " ſtudy war in peace, and are ſo wonted to " conquer, that it is almoſt natural to them to " be victorious; for theſe, I ſay, to be beaten " out of their ſtrength and courage by the " Jews, and at the latter end of the day too, " with God's providence moſt evidently on " their ſide, and the enemy nothing to ſup- " port them, but the fury of their own extra- " vagant deſpairs; beſide that they ſuffer dai- " ly under the judicial vengeance of God's " high diſpleaſure in our favour: witneſs their " factions, famine, ſiege, and the ruin of their " walls, even without battery; which are " but ſo many declarations from heaven a- " gainſt them, to our advantage. It will not " become us therefore to truckle to our infe- " riours, and to caſt off the divine protection. " Shall the Jews that have been train'd up to " ſlavery, and conſequently have little or no " credit to loſe upon that account; ſhall theſe " people, I ſay, have the bravery to charge into " the middle of the Roman troops, and look " death in the face, rather than run the risk " of the ſame condition over again; and all " this, out of mere oſtentation and vanity, " without the leaſt hope or proſpect of ſuc- " ceſs? and ſhall we, on the other hand, that " are effectually the lords and maſters of the " univerſe, and in a manner entitled to a right " of conqueſt; ſhall we, I ſay, lie ſtill and " idle, without ſo much as one bold attempt " upon our adverſaries, waiting only in our " arms, till hunger and fortune ſhall give up " the enemy, without any difficulty, into our " hands? 'Tis but taking Antonia once, and " the town is our own. Or, in caſe we ſhould meet

" meet with any reſiſtance from within " (which I do not expect) it would not be " worth the ſpeaking of; for the advantage " of the higher ground lays the enemy " at our feet without all hope of reco- " very. I do not take upon me here to cele- " brate the hiſtory of thoſe heroes, that ha- " ving ended their days in the field of battle, " ſhall yet live in the memory of future ages " to perpetuity. As for thoſe worthleſs " wretches that think of going down body " and ſoul into the grave together, I wiſh " them a death ſuitable to that abjection of " mind. No man of ſenſe and ſpirit can be ſo " far ignorant of the ſtate of ſouls departed, " as not to underſtand that thoſe that fall by " the fate of war, are immediately tranſlated " into the heavens among the ſtars, to appear " from thence, to their poſterity, like good " angels, or influences to prepare them on the " other ſide for thoſe manſions of bliſs. But " for thoſe that die in their bed, as we ſay, " or of ſome bodily diſeaſe, their ſouls, from " that inſtant, are buried in darkneſs, let them " be never ſo purify'd from pollution, and " their names and memories for ever ſunk and " forgotten. Now ſince ſo it is, that death is " inevitable, and that the ſword compar'd " with any diſeaſe is the eaſier death of the " two, how mean and degenerous a cow- " ardice would it be to withdraw the uſe of a " life from the ſervice of the publick, which " is an indiſpenſible debt to nature, and a " man's country?

Titus his notion of a future ſtate.

" THIS may look, perhaps, as if I took " the ſtorming of this wall to be certain death; " but reſolution is above danger; and he that " fears nothing, deſpairs of nothing. The fall " of the firſt wall has open'd a way to the " reſt; and the ſecond will be eaſily over- " borne, if you do but encourage and ſupport " one another: only ſtand firm, and your very " numbers will do the work: and who knows " at laſt but you may carry your point with- " out blood too. You are to prepare however " for a vigorous oppoſition, and to aſſure " yourſelves, that upon any advantage, either " by ſtratagem, or by force, they will never " be able to withſtand us. And for him that " firſt mounts the breach, it ſhall be my care, " whether he lives or dies, to crown him " with honours and rewards."

He that does well ſhall be ſure of honour and reward.

THESE words of Titus caſt ſuch a damp upon the ſpirits of the army, that there was but one man in the field had the heart to anſwer the end of this diſcourſe. His name was Sabinus; a Syrian born, and a ſoldier of the guards; and a man eminent both for courage and execution: one that had never ſeen him before, would hardly have taken him for a military man, either by his make, or by his outward appearance: he was a little black man; but had a ſoul too large for his body. This man made his reverence, and addreſs'd himſelf to Titus in words to this effect. " I " do here (ſays he) make a tender of myſelf " to Ceſar with all my heart, for the firſt man " to give the aſſault. May Ceſar's fortune " anſwer Sabinus's good-will. Or if I ſhould " miſcarry in the attempt, what I loſe one " way, I get another, in the honour of lay- " ing down my life for my maſter; which " makes it all one to me whether I live or " die."

A glorious action of Sabinus, one of the guards to Titus; and the glorious end he made.

UPON theſe words, with his ſword drawn in his right hand, and his ſhield over his head in his left, he advanced toward the wall about the * ſixth hour of the day, at the head of eleven men, who follow'd him purely in emulation of his virtue. Sabinus, in this action, encounter'd all the enemies ſtones and ſhot, with a ſpirit more than human; and ſeveral of his followers were knock'd down upon that attack. But this did not hinder Sabinus yet from preſſing forward upon the enemies darts and arrows, till he had mounted the wall, and forced the Jews to abandon their ſtation, for fear of an enforcement of greater numbers to over-power them. But what ſhall we ſay now to the ſpiteful malignity of fortune, that takes delight to croſs all virtuous undertakings? for when this heroe was juſt upon the perfecting of his work, he was moſt unluckily overborne with the fall of a ſtone. The Jews looking behind them upon the noiſe, and finding Sabinus lying alone there, and in a manner ſenſeleſs, they all fell upon him with their darts. He defended himſelf upon his knees, with his buckler over his head, as long as he could, and revenged himſelf upon his enemies with his ſword; killing ſome, and wounding others, till in the end, being able to ſtrike no longer, he breathed his laſt under a ſhower of their darts.

THE bravery of this man deſerved a more propitious fate; he but died yet as great as he lived. Three of his companions were cruſhed to death with ſtones from the top of the wall, and there were eight more carried off wounded to the camp. This action paſſed upon the third day of the month † Panemus.

The Romans find the guards aſleep at Antonia, and cut their throats. A terrible fight upon it, with a great ſlaughter and confuſion. A battle of ten hours; and the Jews get the better of it.

TWO days after this, there were got together twenty of the guards of the platforms, the enſign of the fifth legion, two horſemen, and a trumpeter; and making a ſilent march over the ruins up to Antonia, in the dead of the night, without any oppoſition, they found the advance guards faſt aſleep, cut their throats, and ſo taking poſſeſſion of the wall, the trumpet ſounded. Upon this alarm, the reſt wak'd and fled, without waiting to ſee what numbers had entered the place; but betwixt fear and fancy, they gave them for granted to be very ſtrong. Titus immediately, upon this notice, put himſelf at the head of the choiceſt troops he had about him, and ſo took his way up to the ruins. The Jews were ſo terrify'd at this ſurprize, that ſome of them made for the inner temple; others, toward the mine that John had wrought to ſupplant the Roman works: but the two factions of John and Simon giving all for loſt, if the Romans ſhould get the temple, there follow'd a fierce and an obſtinate fight upon it, before the very doors of the place; the one fighting for life, the other for victory. Launces and darts were of little or no uſe on either hand; but the diſpute was now decided by the ſword. In this confuſion, there was no diſtinguiſhing who and who were together; but all crouding, without either order or diſcipline: and ſuch a medley of outcries, that there was no underſtanding one another. The ſlaughter was great on both ſides, and the ground covered with arms and carcaſſes. There was no place either to run away, or to purſue: but as they had the better, or the worſe of it, they advanced, or retired; ſhouting and exulting on the one hand, and lamenting on the other. The front of both armies was of neceſſity either to kill, or to be kill'd; for there was no diſtance left betwixt them for a retreat. The battle, in fine, laſted ten hours: that is to ſay, from the ninth *hour over night to the ſeventh next day. But the furious obſtinacy of the Jews carried it from the reſolution and conduct of the Romans; and it was well for them they did ſo, for their laſt adventure was at ſtake. But the Romans, in the concluſion, contented themſelves for the preſent, that they had gotten Antonia, with only one part of their army; for the legions, upon whom they chiefly depended, were not as yet come up.

broke into an outcry, for fear he might have done himſelf ſome miſchief. The Jews at the ſame time fell upon him with ſwords and darts, while he fenc'd off ſeveral blows with his buckler; and ſtill as he try'd to get up again, he was borne down with multitudes. And yet, ſuch was the proof of his arms, that even at his length upon the ground, they had ſome difficulty to diſpatch him. But, what with loſs of blood and other weakneſs, no mortal daring to ſuccour him, he gave up the ghoſt.

CESAR was moſt ſenſibly touch'd, to ſee ſo brave a man made ſo publick and ſo deplorable a ſpectacle; and eſpecially to find himſelf under the utter impoſſibility of ſaving a perſon he had ſo great a mind to preſerve. But there were others that might have relieved him, if they had but had the courage to attempt it. Julian, in fine, after a long ſtruggle with human frailty, and leaving ſeveral of his enemies wounded behind him, departed this life, to his everlaſting honour, both with friends and foes. The Jews at laſt carry'd off the dead body, and after another repulſe to the Romans, ſhut them up in Antonia. The Jews that ſignaliz'd themſelves in this action, were Alexas, and † Gyphtheus, of John's party: and of Simon's faction, there were Malachias, and Judas the ſon of Merton: James the ſon of Sozas, captain of the Idumeans; and Simon and Judas the ſons of Jair.

A brave exploit of one Julian a centurion; and as notable a misfortune. The Romans ſhut up in Antonia. The names of the Jews that ſignalized themſelves upon this occaſion.

THERE was one Julian, a native of Bithynia, and a centurion; a man well born, and one who for skill in martial diſcipline, corporeal puiſſance, and undaunted reſolution gave ſignal proof of his being the moſt accompliſh'd ſoldier I ever heard of in the whole war. This Julian, as he was ſtanding by Titus in Antonia, and the Romans at that time giving way to the Jews, he took his opportunity, and made a deſperate leap on a ſudden into the thickeſt of the enemy, and ſo gave them chace in his ſingle perſon up to the innermoſt corner of the temple. This prodigious action put the multitude into ſuch an amazement, that there was more in it (they thought) than the bare force of fleſh and blood. But Julian purſu'd his courſe; ſome he overturn'd, others he overtook, and put to death: nothing, in ſhort, was more agreeable to Ceſar's friends, or a more dreadful ſpectacle to his enemies. But there was a fatality yet that befel this man, not to be foreſeen, or avoided. For having his ſhoes ſtudded with iron nails, after the faſhion of other ſoldiers, as he was running upon the pavement, he got a ſlip; and the Romans, upon the claſh of his arms,

Titus has no hand in theſe abominations.*

TITUS, being now reſolved to tear up the foundations of Antonia, and to level the ways for the more commodious march of his whole army, he called for Joſeph, and (underſtanding that on that day, which was the ſeventeenth of the month ‡ Panemus, the ſolemnity of their daily ſacrifice could not be obſerv'd for want of a congregation, and that the people were much troubled at it) ſent him to John a ſecond time upon the ſame errand: that is to ſay, if John had a mind to fight, let him bring what numbers he pleas'd, and he ſhould have the liberty to put it to a battle; provided only that the city and the temple might not be expoſed in the common ruin, and that he would give over prophaning God's holy name and worſhip. Or, if he had a deſire to revive the religious ſervices that had been for ſome time diſcontinued, he might appoint which of the Jews he pleas'd to officiate.

‡ i. e. July.

Now Joſeph did not thing it ſufficient to acquit himſelf of this commiſſion to John alone; but mounting an eminence where he might be furtheſt heard, he communicated Ceſar's pleaſure to the Jews in Hebrew, as loud as he could deliver it: begging of the Jews all the while to have compaſſion of their country, and to prevent the burning of the temple, before it was too late; with liberty to ſolemnize their prayers and ſacrifices, as formerly.

John's execrable ribaldry in return.

THE people gave Joſeph a ſorrowful hearing, without ſo much as one word ſpeaking. But John, after ſeveral virulent and opprobrious invectives againſt Joſeph, ſuperradded this irony; "That there was no danger of "Jeruſalem, if it was the city of God".

Joſeph reaſons the caſe according to his commiſſion.

"No doubt of it, ſays Joſeph. (interrupting him with a loud voice) you have made a "conſcience of keeping every thing pure and "holy, and of paying your duty to that God "from whom you pretend to look for help. "What would you think of that man now, "but as the worſt of enemies, who ſhould rob "you of your daily bread? And yet at the "ſame time you make no difficulty at all of "robbing Almighty God of his daily ſacri"fices and oblations. And what's your quar"rel after this to the Romans, but for ſtand"ing up in defence of your own laws and "worſhip, which you yourſelf ſuppreſs? Ne"ver was there ſo miſerable a turn of religion "and ſtate! ſtrangers and enemies do the of"fice of your beſt friends; and the Jews "themſelves, both by blood and education, "crueller than Barbarians one to another. "But repentance is never out of ſeaſon, let "the caſe be never ſo deſperate. As in the "inſtance of Jechonias the king of the Jews; "who, when the Babylonians made war up"on Jeruſalem, quitted the town upon choice, "before it was taken, and gave up himſelf, "mother, and relations, for hoſtages, to ſave "the holy city and temple from being laid "in aſhes. The name and honour of this "prince ſtand upon record to this day, in an "anniverſary ſolemnity, to the memory of "that illuſtrious action. I cannot recommend "you to a more pertinent or ſeaſonable prece"dent: and let your diſtreſs or offence be "what it will, my life for yours, the Ro"mans ſhall pardon it. Wherefore conſider "well with yourſelf, who it is that adviſes "you; what they are to whom I paſs this "promiſe; what moves me to it; and in whoſe "name I undertake it. Heaven forbid that I "ſhould ever ſubmit to be ſo mean a ſlave, as "to forget what I owe to the place of my "nativity, and to the laws of my country! "And after all this, what do I get for my "good-will now, but freſh indignities, rail"ings, and injuries? And all this is not yet "ſo bad neither as I deſerve, for endeavour"ing to preſerve a race of people that fate "and providence are reſolved to deſtroy. "What can be clearer than the frequent pre"dictions we meet with in hiſtory, pointing "at the deſtruction of this miſerable city; "and that the time of it is then near at hand, "when the Jews are tearing out the hearts "one of another? Now this is ſo far come to "paſs, that not only the houſes, but the tem"ples, are polluted with the blood of your own "tribes. And what is all this now, but the "divine judgment of God, puniſhing the "Jews by the hand of the Romans, which "will probably end in purging the city by "fire?"

A memorable inſtance of Jechonias's piety and prudence.

The fate of Jeruſalem near at hand. God puniſhes the Jews by the hands of the Romans.

JOSEPH could go no further for ſobs and tears, which put the Romans into a tender admiration at the ſoftneſs and humanity of his very diſpoſition: but the more Joſeph lamented, the more implacable were John and his confederates againſt the Romans; inſomuch, that they lay in wait to enveigle Joſeph into a ſnare, and take him priſoner. But his diſcourſe wrought very effectually upon ſeveral of the nobility. There were diverſe of the factious alſo, that finding the caſe deſperate, and giving all for loſt, would have gone over to the Romans, if they durſt have ſtirr'd for fear of their own guards. But others there were, that taking their opportunity, ſtole from their companions and deſerted, in which number were the high-prieſts, Joſeph and Jeſus; the three ſons of Iſmael, that had his head cut off at Cyrene; four ſons of Matthias; and one ſon of another Matthias, who made his eſcape to the Romans, after Simon the ſon of Gioras had put the father and three of his ſons to death, as has been ſaid already. There were alſo a great number of perſons of condition that deſerted with the prieſts, who were graciouſly received by the emperor, but ſent away to Gophne for the preſent, with a promiſe of large poſſeſſions to be diſtributed among them at the end of the war. Titus gave them this aſſignment by themſelves, to avoid the uneaſineſs of a mix'd converſations among people of different manners, laws, and cuſtoms; and they were very thankful for the allotment.

Several of the better ſort give their companions the ſlip.

The Jews give out that the Romans kill all the deſerters.

But Titus proves it a manifeſt impoſture.

WHEN they were all withdrawn to their colony, and none of them ſeen any longer in the city, the faction rais'd a ſpiteful and ſlanderous report, how the Romans kill'd all the deſerters as faſt as they came over to them, with a deſign to fright others from leaving their companions. This invention ſucceeded once again, as before; but Titus, being now aware of the ſtratagem, call'd them all back again from Gophne, and order'd them to take the tour of the walls with Joſeph, and ſhew themſelves to the town, which brought over more proſelytes to the Romans than ever. As they were gather'd together upon this occaſion, they planted themſelves in the ſight of the Romans, and preſſing the faction with importunities and lamentations, begg'd of them either to take the Romans into the town, and deliver their country; or otherwiſe quit the temple, to prevent the firing of it; which the Romans would never agree to but upon the laſt extremity. This did but make the faction more and more outragious againſt the fugitives, with their ſtones, darts, arrows, ſlings, and other hoſtile engines; which being planted at the very gates, made the temple look more like a caſtle than an houſe of religious worſhip; and the dead bodies lay every where ſo thick about it, as if it were a common burying-place. They broke alſo into the holy ſanctuary, with their arms ſtill warm and reeking in the blood of their countrymen, and advanced to ſuch a degree of extravagance, that the Romans pay'd a greater reverence to the Jewiſh rites and ceremonies, than the Jews did to their own. There was not a man in Titus's army, that had not a veneration for the temple itſelf, and for the God that was worſhipped there, and that did not heartily wiſh to ſee the faction repent while there was yet place left for mercy.

TITUS was ſo ſenſibly touch'd with the caſe of theſe wretched people, that he made one trial more yet, how far John, and his confederates, might be wrought upon by reaſon. "Tell me, ſays he, you inhuman miſcreants! "what were all the bars and partitions for, "about this holy place, with the Latin and "Greek inſcriptions upon theſe pillars, for- "bidding all people, upon a penalty, not to "paſs this encloſure? Neither have we our- "ſelves been leſs tender of your privileges, in "making it death for any man to paſs theſe "bounds, not excepting the Romans them- "ſelves. How comes the ſanctuary after this, "to be prophaned with aſſaſſinations and mur- "ders, and the temple defil'd with blood, "foreign and domeſtick. I appeal to all the "Gods of my country, and to the late patron "of this holy temple, (who hath now forſaken "it,) to my army, to the Jews that have "join'd with me, and finally to yourſelves, "that I am innocent of all theſe abominations: "and I do ſacredly promiſe, that, if you will "but comply in quitting this holy place, no "man ſhall approach to offer it any indignity; "but that I'll preſerve and protect your tem- "ple even whether you will or no."

CHAP. V.

Titus forced upon the war. He forms his party, and poſts himſelf upon fort Antonia. An attack in the night, follow'd with a diſmal uproar and confuſion. Day-light brings them into order again. A drawn battle at laſt. Several Jewiſh heroes that fought bravely. Four mounts erected. A bloody diſpute. A famous action of one Pedanius. The Jews fire the temple-galleries. A phantaſtical challenge. Jonathan kills Pudens; and Priſcus kills Jonathan.

TITUS, upon this occaſion, made uſe of Joſeph for his interpreter; but the faction made a wrong conſtruction of it, and imputed the fairneſs of the application rather to fear, than good-will, and the Jews grew inſolent upon that miſtake. When Titus found they had no regard, either to the temple, or to themſelves, he reſolved, though much againſt his mind, to carry on the war. But he could not draw up his whole army againſt them, becauſe there was not room ſufficient; ſo that he detach'd thirty out of every company, with a tribune at the head of every thouſand, and Cerealis to command them all in chief. With this detachment they were to have fallen on upon the enemy's guards about the ninth * hour of the night, and Titus himſelf to have led on the attack: but upon a council of war, the officers were all of opinion for Titus rather to poſt himſelf upon the fort Antonia, where he might ſee and obſerve how his men acquitted themſelves, without running the riſque of any common danger in his own perſon; beſide, that it would inſpire his people with a new ſoul, to ſhew their bravery in the ſight of their general.

Titus forced upon a war.

He forms his party.

Poſts himſelf upon fort Antonia, within view of the action.

TITUS, in fine, render'd himſelf to the reaſons of his officers and friends; and ſo withdrew to a watch-tower in Antonia, where he might ſee and judge of the whole action; charging his officers at the ſame time to take ſtrict notice who did well, or ill, that he might ſee them rewarded, or puniſhed accordingly. The matter was no ſooner ſettled, but order was given, and an hour appointed, for the attack. The Romans did not find the enemy aſleep this time, as was expected; but the advance guards came preſently to blows, with a confuſion of clamours; and, upon wakening their fellows, brought them on the multitudes to ſecond them. The Romans ſtood the firſt ſhock; but the numbers that follow'd fell indifferently upon their own people, without knowing friend and foe aſunder: for betwixt the noiſe of the uproar, and the darkneſs of the night, they knew neither voices nor faces apart; but following the impulſe only of a blind rage and paſſion, they fell foul upon what came next in their way at a venture. But the Romans keeping themſelves in orderly bodies all this while, under the cover of their bucklers, and knowing one another by the word, or ſignal, made a tolerable ſhift in the conflict; whereas the Jews moved not one ſober ſtep backward or forward; but miſtaking their enemies for their friends, and their friends for their enemies, deſtroy'd more of their own men than the Romans themſelves did. But upon break of day, ſo ſoon as the light ſhew'd them their errors, they betook themſelves to a more regular way of combat, and fell to their darts and arrows, both ſides as freſh and vigorous as if they had done nothing all night. Now the Romans, who had Titus for the judge, witneſs, and ſpectator, of their behaviour, and looked upon the bravery of that day's action as the foundation of their future fortunes, fought one and all in a noble ſtrife and emulation, who ſhould do beſt; while the Jews at the ſame time had their own lives and the temple at ſtake, with the tyrant John at the head of them, cajoling ſome with fair words, and treating others with menaces and blows. This fight was moſt of it hand to hand, but with various changes backward and forward; for there was hardly any room either for flight or purſuit. Antonia was, in effect, but a kind of theatre to the battle; Titus and his friends the ſpectators; calling out to the actors one while to follow their advantage, other while to ſtand their ground, as they ſaw occaſion; and there paſſed nothing that eſcap'd their obſervation. The diſpute laſted, in fine, from the ninth hour of the night, to the † fifth the next day; both ſides maintaining their ground, and coming, in the concluſion, to a drawn battle. There were ſeveral noble Romans that behaved themſelves like heroes; and the moſt remarkable captains of the Jews were as follows. Of Simon's party, there were Judas the ſon of Merton, Simon the ſon of Joſias, Jacob the ſon of Soſa, and Simon the ſon of Cathlas, Idumeans. And then of

John's

John's disciples, there were Gyphtheus and Alexas; and of the Zelotes, there was Simon the son of Jair.

The passes about Antonia level'd.

IN the compass of seven days, the foundations of Antonia were all turn'd up to the bottom, and a broad way cut out for the legions to march up to the wall; where they immediately fell to work upon four mounts: the first, over against the corner of the inner temple that looks north and east: the second, against the gallery, to the northward betwixt the two gates: the third, toward the west porch of the outward temple; and the fourth, toward the north porch. But it was an infinite charge and labour, the bringing of the materials an hundred * furlongs from the place; beside the many surprizes they met withal by the way; for the Romans were over confident and careless, and the Jews rash and desperate enough to venture upon any thing.

Four mounts erected.

IT was the practice of several of the Romans, when they went out a foraging, to turn their horses loose a grazing; and it was then a common thing for the Jews to sally out upon so fair an opportunity, and carry them off. This happen'd so often that Titus imputed it at last rather to the negligence of the Romans, than to the daring industry of the Jews. And he found himself much in the right too; for upon the putting of one soldier to death for the loss of his horse, it secured all the rest; for the soldiers took care never to lose their horses afterwards.

WHEN they had now raised their platforms, and put themselves in condition to mount their attacks against the temple, there came down the next day a rabble of a faction, that were ready to starve in the city for want of pillage. This seditious crew about the eleventh † hour of the day, made an effort upon the Roman guards toward the ‡ mount of Olivet, in hope of either taking them at unawares, or finding them withdrawn to repose themselves. The Romans saw the storm a coming; and taking the alarm in time, drew out all the strength they were able to make, and put a check to a most desperate attempt they had projected upon the wall. It came, in short, to a bloody dispute, and there were great things done on both sides; the Romans valuing themselves upon the reputation of their prowess and military conduct, and the Jews flattering themselves in the force of a fool-hardy and a mistaken valour. The one fought for shame, the other upon necessity: for the Romans looked upon the Jews to be now as good as nooséd, and could never have wip'd off the disgrace, if they had let them go again: and the Jews, on the other hand, had no hopes of coming off, but by forcing the Romans, and breaking down the wall.

An attack, and a bloody dispute upon it.

A wonderful exploit of one Pedanius.

THERE goes a wonderful story of one Pedanius, a Roman cavalier, which is thus: The Jews happen'd to be routed once, and pursu'd by the besiegers into the valley: this same Pedanius pushing full speed after them, overtook a corpulent young man and heavy arm'd, spurring for life. He took him off from his horse by the leg, in the middle of his course, and carried him away a prisoner, for a present to Cesar. Titus was in high admiration at the prodigious strength of this man; but the prisoner was put to death upon it, for the villany of the attempt; Titus's heart at the same time being set upon the dispatch and finishing of the great work.

THE Jews finding themselves every day weaker and weaker, the war hotter, and the contagion ready to seize the very temple itself, the Jews did in this case, as men do in pestilential distempers, by cutting off the infected parts, to save the body. According to this allegory, the Jews began with setting fire to that part of the gallery, that reaching from the north to the east, faced Antonia: where they made a gap of near twenty †† cubits, and wrought the final destruction of the holy place with their own hands.

The Jews set fire to the temple galleries.

ON the four and twentieth of the month above mentioned, the Romans put the same gallery in a flame; and when the fire had gain'd fourteen  cubits, the Jews took down the roof of it, and so went on still cutting off all communication with Antonia: not but that they might have hindered the burning of it, if they would, as they ought to have done; but their way was to regulate the mischief they did by their own convenience: and all this while there passed daily skirmishes and encounters, every where about the temple.

A fantastical challenge of one Jonathan.

THERE was at this time a contemptible figure of a man, that was a Jew; a dwarfish puny-look'd fellow, and as despicable for his fortune and family, as otherwise; and his name was Jonathan. He went out one day to the monument of John the high-priest, and there talking vain-gloriously of himself, he made a challenge to any man of the whole Roman army to meet him with his sword in his hand. There was no body appeared to take him up; but some despised him; others, as it falls out many times in those cases, were afraid of him: some were not for fighting, they said, with a man that had a mind to die; nor others with men in despair, that fear neither God nor man; or, where there is honour to be lost on the one side, and none to be gotten on the other: beside that a brute and a man are not upon equal terms. When this insolent scoffing Jew had waited a long time for a champion, descanting upon the cowardice of the Romans, and no body came; there was a proud arrogant man, one Pudens, a Roman cavalier, who out of an indignation for this affront, stood forth inconsiderately enough, and accepted the challenge; which in the end made sport for the company: the contempt he had for the Jew made him rash and careless; so that getting an unlucky fall by a slip, Jonathan made his advantage of it, and killed him when he was down; trampling the dead body under his feet, and vapouring over it with buckler in his left hand, and his bloody ſword in his right, clattering his arms together, and inſulting at the ſame time with foul language and ribaldry, both againſt his adverſary and the ſpectators of the Roman army. While Jonathan was in the height of his buffoonry and exultation, Priſcus, a centurion, ſhot him through the heart with an arrow, which ſtruck him dead upon the body of his enemy. This put both Jews and Romans into an uproar, though upon differing motives, and was look'd upon as a juſt judgment upon Jonathan, for aſſuming that to his virtue, which was only due to his fortune.

CHAP. VI.

A war betwixt the temple and the mounts. The Jews confound the Romans by a ſtratagem. Titus pities them. The bravery of Longus. A ſtrange eſcape of Artorius.

THE faction in the temple was now in open war with the ſoldiers upon the mounts; and on the twenty ſeventh of the month aforeſaid, the Jews bethought themſelves of this ſtratagem. They fill'd the roof of the weſtern porch, betwixt the top of it and the timber, with a quantity of dry wood, ſulphur, and bituminous matter; and then pretending to give way upon an attack, they ſuffer'd themſelves to be beaten out, as if they had not been able to maintain it. A company of raſh people follow'd them cloſe upon the purſuit, and ſet up ladders to make good what the other had quitted; but the wiſer ſort look'd upon the whole to be a trick, and never ſtirr'd for the matter. Upon the Romans crowding into the porch, the Jews ſet fire to it, and all was immediately in a blaze, to the aſtoniſhment even of thoſe that were out of reach of it; but the moſt deſperate horror and confuſion of the reſt imaginable. Some plung'd themſelves into wells and pits; others leapt head-long down among their enemies, ſome running one way, ſome another: ſome were ſmother'd in the flame, and others caſt themſelves upon their ſwords, to prevent death by another.

An open war betwixt the temple and the mounts. The Jews deſtroy the Romans by a ſtratagem.

THIS ſpectacle went to the heart of Ceſar, out of a generous compaſſion he had for the calamity of ſo diſmal a miſcarriage: not but that he was highly offended at his ſoldiers, for venturing upon ſuch an attack without orders. But they had this comfort however in their diſtreſs, that to balance the loſs of their lives they had the love and pity of the prince for whom they dy'd; for they could ſee him calling and labouring up and down to do all that was poſſible for their relief: and every inſtance of his affection was look'd upon as a memorial to his immortal honour. As for thoſe that made a ſhift to eſcape the fury of the flames, they were beſet by the Jews, and after a ſtout reſiſtance every man of them put to the ſword.

Titus pities them with a generous compaſſion.

THERE fell abundance of brave men in this terrible adventure, but none greater than one Longus; who, with honour to all the reſt in general, muſt not be forgotten upon this occaſion in particular. This Longus was a Roman, and in the vigour of his youth. The Jews found him a daring and a dangerous man, and had no way to cut him off unleſs they could get him down to them upon honour, that he ſhould return ſafe again without any violence to his perſon. His brother Cornelius taking notice of this, call'd out to him on the other hand, adjuring him not to do any thing, that either his country or himſelf ſhould have reaſon to be aſham'd of. Longus upon this, drew his ſword, and in the ſight of both parties kill'd himſelf.

The bravery of Longus.

THERE was alſo one Artorius that deliver'd himſelf from the fire by an artificial addreſs. He was reduc'd to an extremity; and ſeeing one Lucius, his fellow-ſoldier, and comrade, within call: "Catch me in thy arms, ſays he, "and break my fall, and I'll make thee my "heir." Artorius took his leap; and the other diſpoſing himſelf to receive him, the weight of the one deſtroy'd the other, daſhing him to pieces upon the place. This miſcarriage for the preſent made many a ſad heart among the Romans; but it kept them afterward upon a better guard againſt the ſubtilties and ſtratagems of the Jews, which were very ſly and dangerous to thoſe that were not well aware of them.

A ſtrange eſcape of Artorius.

THE porch was burnt as far as the tower that John erected in his war with Simon, upon the pillars that led to it: and the Jews, after the burning of the Romans, as above, broke down the reſt. On the day following, the Romans put fire alſo to the north porch, and ſo carry'd it before them to that on the eaſt, that overlooks the valley of Cedron, from a precipice that makes a perſon's head giddy to look down it.

CHAP. VII.

The extreme miſery that attends a famine.

THIS was the face of things about the temple; the city well nigh depopulated with a devouring famine, and the numbers of the miſerable inhabitants deſtroy'd thereby inexpreſſible. It was enough to create a war in a family, to have but any jealouſy of meat in it, and enough to break the tendereſt friendſhips in nature. Thoſe that were evidently ſtarv'd to death could not yet be believed at the laſt gaſp, that they dy'd in want: but they would ſearch the very boſoms of the dead for bread, when they had no longer any breath in their bodies. If they miſs'd what they look'd for, their deſpairs hurry'd them up and down, raging like mad dogs, and ſtaggering like ſo many drunken men; ranſacking every nook and corner of the ſame houſes over and over again; nothing coming amiſs to them, which the fouleſt of brutes themſelves would boggle at; girdle, ſhoo-leather, beaſts-skins, &c. nay an handful of old hay was ſold for a * tetradrachm. But why do I trouble myſelf with illuſtrations of this dreadful judgment, by things inanimate; having at hand

No diſtreſs like that of a famine.

* A tetradrachm is four Attick drachma's, and an Attick, according to Calmet's table, where it is valued almoſt one ſeventh lower than by other authors, was equivalent to ſix pence three farthings and three eighths of a farthing Engliſh money; four therefore, according to this author, muſt be equivalent to two ſhillings and three pence half penny farthing: but as we ourſelves have ſeen and weighed ſeveral tetradrachms, we can aſſure the reader that they were of fine ſilver, and ſomething heavier than an Engliſh half crown.

ſuch an inſtance for matter of fact as was never known, either among Greeks or Barbarians! and the ſtory is not to be heard or reported without horror. I could be well enough content to paſs over this relation, leſt poſterity ſhould take me for a falſary: but I have ſo many witneſſes to the truth of it, that I ſhould be wanting to my country in ſuch a partiality to the dead, as to ſuppreſs it.

CHAP. VIII.

A mother dreſſes and eats the fleſh of her own ſon. Ceſar innocent upon the whole matter.

THERE was a certain rich gentlewoman beyond Jordan, whoſe name was Mary. She was the daughter of Eleazar, of the village † Vetezobra; that is to ſay, the Houſe of Hyſſop. She fled in company with ſeveral others, and took ſanctuary in Jeruſalem, where they had the fortune to be beſieg'd. The tyrants ſtripp'd this lady of all ſhe brought publickly along with her, that was precious; and for any thing elſe that was conceal'd, either goods or proviſions, her houſe was daily broken up and rifled by the ſoldiers. Upon this uſage, the woman fell foul upon the faction with the bittereſt and the moſt outrageous language; but could not prevail with any of theſe monſters yet, either in pity or in rage, to put her to death. When ſhe found herſelf brought to this extremity, that ſhe had no way left in nature to keep body and ſoul together (the gripes of a tormenting famine having already ſeiz'd her, and no poſſibility of getting over them) ſhe deliver'd herſelf up to fury and neceſſity, and pitch'd upon the moſt unnatural reſolution that ever was heard of.

SHE had a child ſucking at her breaſt, which ſhe ſnatch'd up; and looking tenderly upon it, "What, ſays ſhe, ſhall I ſay now to "thee, thou moſt unfortunate infant, to be "brought into the world, under a complica-"tion of three ſuch dreadful judgments, as "war, famine, and rebellion! Which of the "three ſhall I reſerve thee for? The Romans "will give thee thy life perhaps, but not thy "liberty. Now famine will prevent ſlavery; "but for our preſent tyrants, thou wilt find "them incomparably worſe than the other "two. What canſt thou do better now, than "to ſupply the want of a meal's meat to thy "ſtarving mother, and ſting the party with "the horror of the fact? and then finally "crown the hiſtory of the Jews with the on-"ly execrable abomination that is yet want-"ing to the perfecting of their miſery?" With theſe words, ſhe kill'd her child, boil'd and dreſs'd it; the one half of it ſhe eat herſelf, and the other half ſhe ſet by out of the way, and kept cover'd. The faction preſently ſmelt out the inhuman cookery, and came immediately to the woman's houſe, with menaces of death without mercy, if ſhe did not forthwith bring them out her proviſions. The woman told them that this was all ſhe had, and ſo ſhew'd them the remainder of her child. They ſtood like ſtatues upon the very ſight of it, and ſo fell to trembling, and ran ſtark mad.

A mother dreſſes and eats the fleſh of her own ſon.

"Look ye, ſays the woman, this is really "my ſon, and this diſh is of my dreſſing. I "have eaten the one half myſelf, and pray "do you eat the other. You will not pre-"tend I hope, to be nicer than a woman, or "tenderer than a mother: but if you make "any ſcruple of conſcience at the oblation, I "have eaten part of it already, and you may "leave the reſt where you found it." Upon this, they went their way in a quaking terror, and with ſome difficulty, left the child with the unhappy mother, the only thing they ever boggled at.

THE noiſe of this bloody execution was quickly ſpread all over the city; and ſuch an abhorrence for it in general, as if every ſingle man had had a part in the crime. The dread of the famine made men weary of their lives, and the living envy'd the dead, that were taken away before the extravagance came to the height. The ſtory was quickly gotten from the Jews to the Romans, where ſome pity'd the people, others hated them for it, and ſome again gave no credit to it. Ceſar acquitted himſelf, as in the preſence of God, that he had done all he could to make the Jews eaſy and happy, in their lives, liberties, and fortunes: but if they had rather be tearing one another to pieces, than live in union, who could help it? If they had rather have war than peace, or famine than plenty; nay, if nothing elſe would ſerve their turn, but that they themſelves muſt fire that very temple which Titus did all that he could to preſerve, their own children were meat good enough for ſuch parents; and he was reſolved to bury their iniquities in their ruin, and not to leave a city ſtanding under the ſun, where mothers devour'd their own children; and the fathers yet the more impious of the two, for keeping up the war, after ſo many demonſtrations of God's terrible diſpleaſure againſt it. Titus after this, reflecting upon the incorrigible hardneſs and obſtinacy of the faction, gave them all for loſt; for if any thing in nature would have wrought upon them, the calamities they had ſuffer'd already might poſſibly have reclaim'd them.

Ceſar declares himſelf innocent of the whole matter.

ward temple; having play'd the best piece of battery he had for six whole days without intermission; but to no purpose; for the work was proof against the engines. There were others at the same time sapping the foundations on the north side; and when they found that with an incredible labour, they could only loosen some of the outward stones, without moving any of the rest (for the porch stood yet firm) they perceiv'd at last that there was no good to be done by digging and mining, or by the help of levers and bars; so that the Romans betook themselves to their scaling ladders.

Titus tries scaling ladders.

The Jews make a stout resistance.

THE Jews could not hinder them from planting their ladders; but they made a brave resistance, where there was any place for it: encountering those that got up, hand to hand, before they could put themselves upon their guard; casting others down head-long, as they were mounting; cutting off some as they were advancing with relief; and sometimes overturning ladders, men and all together. So that the Romans loss upon this encounter was very considerable; especially in the disputes they had for the defending or recovering of their colours, as one of the nicest points of honour amongst the soldiers. But, in the conclusion, the Jews kept the ensigns that they took, and kill'd the ensign-bearers; which terrify'd the rest, and forced them to a retreat. Now to give the besiegers their due at last, there fell not a man of them but dy'd like a Roman. Those of the faction that had done bravely in former encounters, did so still; and so did Eleazar, the nephew of the tyrant Simon: but Titus finding by this time, that, in sparing a strange temple, he did but sacrifice his own men, he gave order to his people forthwith to set fire to the gates.

And the Romans behave themselves like men of honour.

The Romans order'd to set fire to the gates.

Two treacherous deserters go over to Titus.

UPON this occasion, there came over to him, Ananus of Emmaus, one of Simon's guards, and the most inhuman wretch he had about him; with Archelaus the son of Magadathes: who flatter'd themselves with the hope of better quarter for leaving the faction upon a winning hand. Titus was so well informed of the barbarous practices and characters of these pretended converts, that he was once in the mind, notwithstanding this pretence, to have cut off both their heads; being fully convinced, that it was pure necessity and design, not affection or good will, that brought them over. Neither did he take them to have deserved their lives for that service, that first set their country in a flame, and then abandoned it. But however, upon second thoughts, he overcame the provocation, and so forgave them, though with a resolution never to trust them.

Titus suspects, but pardons them.

The Jews wrapt up in flames.

THE gates were by this time in a blaze; the silver-work over them melted, and the timbers all in a flame; insomuch, that the fire was gotten to the next galleries. This was such a surprize to the Jews, to find themselves wrapt up in flames, that they stood staring one upon another as if they had been thunder-struck, without so much as attempting any thing toward their relief, or concerning themselves, either for what was already consumed, or for the saving of the rest. They had, in short, neither heart nor strength left them; and the fire got ground all that day, and the night following, till by little and little it burnt down the galleries.

The galleries burnt to the ground.

TITUS gave order next day for the quenching of the fire, and the levelling of the ways for the march of his army. After this he called a council of his general officers; that is to say, Tiberius Alexander, his lieutenant-general; Sextus Cerealis, the commander of the fifth legion; Lorgius Lepidus, of the tenth; Titus Trigius, of the fifteenth: and there were with these, Æternius Fronto, the captain of the two Alexandrian legions; and Marcus Antonius Julianus, the governor of Judea: with colonels, and other officers, to advise withal what measures to take in the business of the temple. Some were for keeping up to the strictness of the law of arms; for so long as that temple stood, and the numerous meetings there continued, the Jews (they said) would never be quiet: others were for the saving of the temple, upon condition of the Jews quitting it; and that there might be no farther quarrel about it: but if it should be gotten by the sword, by all means to burn it; not as a temple, but as a castle; for in that case, the fault would be theirs that forced the burning of it, not theirs that did it by necessity. But, says Titus, interposing here, "if the Jews will be obstinate, and turn a "temple into a citadel, shall I revenge the "stubbornness of a rebellious people upon "stocks and stones, and lay the most glorious "fabrick of the universe in ashes for their "sakes? It would be an affront to the dignity of Rome itself, to think of depriving "the empire of so illustrious an ornament." When Fronto, Alexander, and Cerealis, perceived the general's meaning, they came over to his opinion, and so the council was dismissed, with orders to the army to rest and refresh themselves, to be the fitter for action; several choice battalions being commanded out in the mean time to look after the fire, and cut out ways over the ruins. The Jews being now harrassed, with hard labour, and their courage quell'd, were quiet enough for this day: but the day following, when they had gathered strength, and taken heart again, they made a desperate sally about the second hour of the day through the eastern gate, upon the guards of the outward temple. The Romans stood the first shock, like a wall against them, under the pow'r of their bucklers, with a mighty resolution; but that would not have lasted long against such an odds of fierceness and numbers, if Cesar, with a select body of horse (who saw the action from Antonia) had not come seasonably up to their relief, before they gave ground. The Jews shrunk upon this charge; and the Romans breaking in upon the front, the rest betook themselves to flight: and then the Romans drawing off in their course, the Jews rally'd and came on again. At this rate they took their turns interchangeably, charging and retreating till about the fifth† hour of the day; when the Jews were forced into the temple, and shut up there. Titus upon this withdrew to Antonia, with a resolution to attack the temple with his whole army the next morning. But God in his providence had from all eternity doom'd it to the fire; and in course of time,

time, the fatal day was now at hand: the tenth of the month * Lous, and the very ſame day whereupon it was formerly burnt by the king of Babylon. But this was a conflagration which the Jews brought upon themſelves; for Titus had no ſooner left them in quiet, but the rebels made a ſally upon Ceſar's guards as they were at work, by his order, to extinguiſh the fire: who put the Jews to the rout upon it, and had the purſuit of them to the temple.

Jeruſalem now burnt a ſecond time on the ſame day of the month.

CHAP. X.

A ſoldier pretends a divine impulſe, and ſets fire to the temple. Titus endeavours to ſtop it. A dreadful maſſacre.

THERE was at this time a certain ſoldier, that, without any pretence of authority or conſcience for ſo impious a fact, took upon him to act by the inſpiration of a divine impulſe. He mounted the ſhoulders of one of his comrades, and then caſt a flaming brand into the golden window that looks toward the apartments on the north-ſide of the temple. The place took fire immediately, which raiſed ſuch an hideous outcry among the Jews, that they haſten'd all that was poſſible to their relief. For this was not a time, by ſparing of their lives, or their perſons, when they had loſt the only thing that had made life precious to them. The news of this conflagration being brought to Titus, juſt as he was laying himſelf down in his tent to take a little repoſe after the fatigue of the combat, he leapt up; and immediately taking his chariot, paſſed away with it to the temple, to try what he could do toward the putting out of the fire. His great officers followed him, and the legions after them, in ſuch a confuſion, as is but natural to a prodigious multitude without diſcipline. Ceſar did all that was to be done with words and ſigns, towards having it extinguiſh'd; but it all ſignify'd nothing; for the greater noiſe drown'd the leſs, and they were every jot as blind to the ſigns and motions of his hand, as they were deaf to what he ſaid. Neither were the ſoldiers govern'd by menaces or commands; but only follow'd the dictates of rage and paſſion: ſome were trampled upon, and ſqueez'd to death in crouds; others choak'd in the ſultry ruins of the galleries over the porches; and the ſame thing, whether they overcame, or were overcome. The common ſoldiers in the temple pretended, in excuſe of their diſobedience, that they could not hear their emperor's orders; and they that followed, gave the word forward to throw fire. The ſeditious, in fine, had no way in the world to prevent it; and which way ſoever they turn'd themſelves, they ſaw nothing but blood and deſtruction. As for the poor people, the ſickly, and the unarm'd, they put them to the ſword wherever they found them: mountains of dead bodies were pil'd up about the altar, and ſtreams of blood flow'd down the ſtairs; with numbers of miſerable creatures weltering in their own gore.

A ſoldier ſets fire to the temple, under pretext of a divine impulſe.

Titus does all he can to ſtop it, but to no purpoſe.

A dreadful maſſacre, and confuſion.

WHEN Titus ſaw there was no reſtraining the fury of his ſoldiers, and that the fury of the fire increaſed more and more, he took ſome of his chief officers along with him into the inward temple; where, upon a ſtrict examination of matters, he found the glory and magnificence of the place, even beyond the very fame of it; or at leaſt equal to the report of the Jews themſelves. But Titus obſerving, that the fire had not as yet taken the ſanctuary, and making a true judgment upon it, that it might not be yet too late to ſave the holy place, he ſtarted up, and in his own perſon earneſtly beſought his ſoldiers to do their uttermoſt to put a ſtop to the fire; giving it in charge alſo to Liberalis, a centurion of his guards, to preſs the doing of it, and to cudgel thoſe that refus'd. But what with an ungovernable rage, and an impotent fondneſs for war, neither fear nor reſpect was ſufficient to keep them within the compaſs of their duty. There were others again that had their hearts ſet upon the booty; not doubting, but where the doors were plated with gold, they ſhould find the inſide all fill'd with hidden treaſure. While Ceſar was ſo very intent upon the ſaving of the temple, one of the ſoldiers at the ſame time ſet fire to ſome of the door-poſts; whereupon Titus and his captains were forced to withdraw out of diſtance of preventing the miſchief: ſo that the temple was deſtroyed at laſt, in deſpite of whatever Titus could do to hinder it.

THIS deſolation was a calamity to make a body's heart bleed; the ruin of the moſt wonderful fabrick that ever was ſeen or heard of, both for ſtructure, bulk, ſtate, magnificence, the honour of religion, and of holy things. But we have this for our comfort and inſtruction yet, that there is an uncontrolable fatality attends all the works of the creation, whether animate, or inanimate; and that all things muſt have their period. It is a moſt remarkable revolution alſo, that this ſecond conflagration ſhould ſo exactly anſwer the very day and month of the former, under the king of Babylon, as is ſaid already. We reckon from the building of the firſt temple by Solomon, to the deſtruction of this in the ſecond year of Veſpaſian, eleven hundred and thirty years, ſeven months, and fifteen days: and from that of Haggai, in the ſecond of Cyrus, we account ſix hundred thirty nine years, and forty five days.

CHAP. XI.

A cruelty that ſpares neither age, ſex, nor quality. Nothing to be ſeen but fire and blood. Several prieſts engaged in the quarrel. The temple conſumed to aſhes, and all that was in it. Six thouſand poor people deſtroy'd upon the credit of enthuſiaſts.

WHEN the temple was now in flames, the ſoldiers ſeized all that came to hand, and kill'd all they met, to the degree of a moſt prodigious ſlaughter and pillage, without any reſpect either to age or ſex; but young and old, ſacred and prophane, prieſts and laicks, they all went together, and men of all ſorts and qualities were equally involv'd in the common calamities of the war; and

An outragious cruelty, that ſpares neither age, ſex nor quality.

whether

whether they reſiſted, or ſubmitted; whether they ſtood it out, or begg'd quarter, they far'd all alike. As the fire advanced, the crackling of the flames was heard, accompany'd with the dying groans of people at their laſt gaſp; and betwixt the depth of the hill, and the extent of the conflagration, the whole city ſeem'd to be but one continued blaze. The tumult and uproar was ſo dreadful, that it is not poſſible to imagine any thing more terrible: what with the raging outcries of the Roman legions, the howling of the rebels when they found themſelves at the mercy of fire and ſword, and the diſmal lamentations of diſtreſſed wretches in the temple, betwixt the enemy and the fire: in fine, thoſe upon the mountain, and thoſe in the city, anſwering one another by turns; the flames opening the eyes of thoſe that the famine had wellnigh cloſed, and inſpiring freſh ſpirit and ability to deplore their misfortunes. The neighbouring mountains and places beyond Jordan, echoing the ſame complaints and grievances over and over again; and the calamity, in weight, and ſubſtance, yet more than the noiſe.

Nothing to be ſeen but fire and blood.

The flaſhes were ſo impetuous and violent, that the very mountain the temple ſtood upon, looked as if it had been one body of fire from the bottom; and the blood, in proportion, anſwerable to the flame; for the number of the ſlain was ſuperior to that of thoſe that did the execution. The ground was covered all over with carcaſſes, and the ſoldiers purſued the living over the bodies of the dead: but in the end, a band of ruffians beat back the Romans; and having forced their way into the outward temple, made their eſcape into the city, and the reſt of the multitude got into the outward porch.

Several prieſts engag'd in the quarrel.

THERE were a great many prieſts engaged in this quarrel with the Romans, that made uſe of their temple-ſpits inſtead of darts, and of their ſeats with lead in them, that did them the office of ſtones: but when they ſaw that this would do no good, and that the fire found them out ſtill wherever they were, they covered themſelves for a while under a thick wall of eight * cubits over. Two of the principal men of this number, (Meirus the ſon of Belgas, and Joſeph the ſon of Daleus) that might have ſaved themſelves by going over to the Romans, choſe rather to ſtand or fall with their companions; and ſo plunging themſelves into the flames, ran the ſame fate with the temple.

The temple, and all that was precious in it, laid in aſhes.

WHEN the Romans found the temple itſelf laid in aſhes, they did not think it worth their while to ſpare any of the reſt of the buildings, and ſo put fire to all at once; as the gates, and galleries, &c. ſave only one on the eaſt-ſide, and another on the ſouth: and theſe likewiſe, not long after, follow'd the fortune of the reſt. They burnt alſo the treaſury, and the wardrobe, with jewels, money, rich habits, and other goods to an incredible value. In one word, this place was the repoſitory of all the Jews had that was precious.

THERE were now gotten together into one gallery, without the temple, that was yet ſtanding, in women, children, and a mixed multitude that fled from the rabble, to the number of near ſix thouſand perſons. But before Ceſar could give any order or direction in the caſe, the ſoldiers, in an extravagant brutal fury, ſet the place on fire, and plied it ſo cloſe that betwixt thoſe that were burnt to death, and others that caſt themſelves headlong down the ruin to ſave themſelves, there was not one ſoul came off alive.

Six thouſand poor people deſtroy'd by the advice of enthuſiaſts.

THE occaſion of this miſchief was a certain impoſtor, who took upon him to deliver a meſſage from Almighty God, that day, to the people, and to this effect. He commanded them in the name of God to go immediately up to the temple, with an aſſurance, that they ſhould there receive an infallible proof of his divine favour and protection. This was a common practice of the faction to pretend revelations to keep the credulous multitude firm againſt all dangers, and to ſecure them from deſerting. But men in adverſity are apt to hope the beſt, eſpecially where they are promiſed relief, though it be but upon the credit of a falſe prophet.

CHAP. XII.

More credit given to falſe oracles than to the truth itſelf. A comet in the figure of a ſword. A ſtrange light about the altar. A cow brings forth a lamb. A brazen gate opens of itſelf. Chariots and armed men ſeen in the air. Foreboding exclamations from a poor country creature. He is firſt puniſhed for it, and then diſcharged as a madman. In the concluſion, he foretells his own deſtruction. A prophecy of an emperor to come out of Judea expounded of Veſpaſian.

We give more heed to falſe oracles, than to truth itſelf.

HOW eaſily were theſe ſuperſtitious wretches ſeduced into a belief of falſe oracles, counterfeits, and impoſtors! But when they were at any time premoniſh'd from the lips of truth itſelf, by prodigies, and other monitory prognoſticks, of their approaching ruin, they had neither eyes, ears, nor underſtanding, to make a right uſe or application of them; but paſſed them over without either heeding, or ſo much as thinking of them. As for example now;

A prodigious comet in the figure of a ſword.

WHAT ſhall we ſay to the comet that hung over Jeruſalem for one whole year together, in the figure of a ſword?

A wonderful light about the altar.

WHAT ſhall we think again of that wonderful light that was ſeen about the altar, a little before the revolt, on the eighth of the month †Xanthicus, at the ninth ‡ hour of the night, upon the celebration of the paſchal feaſt, and continued for the ſpace of half an hour as bright as day. This prodigy was looked upon by the ignorant as a good omen; but it was expounded by thoſe that knew better things, as the forerunner of a war, and the myſtery unfolded before it came to paſs.

A cow that brought forth a lamb.

AT the ſame feſtival, there was another prodigy of a cow deliver'd of a lamb in the middle of the temple, as they were leading her up to the altar for a ſacrifice.

* Eight cubits were ſomething upwards of fourteen Engliſh feet and an half, that is five yards lacking half a foot.
† i. e. April.
‡ That is our three o'clock in the morning.

The eaſtern gate of the inner temple, was made of ſolid braſs; and ſo very heavy, that it was as much as twenty men could do every night to ſhut it; beſides that it was faſten'd with iron bolts and bars, mortis'd into a huge threſhold of one intire ſtone. This gate, about the ſixth * hour of the night, open'd of itſelf; and upon early notice given of it to the proper officer, he came immediately up to look after it, and had much ado to make it faſt again. Some ignorant people there were that took this for another good omen, deſcanting upon it, that it was a gate of bleſſings ſet open to them by providence; but the wiſer ſort made a contrary judgment of it; and that the opening of the gate was in favour of the enemy, and foretold deſolation to the city.

A brazen gate opening of itſelf.

Some ſhort time after the feſtival was over (on the twenty firſt of the month † Artemiſius) there appeared a prodigy of a viſion ſo extraordinary, that I ſhould hardly venture to report it, if I could not produce ſeveral eye-witneſſes that are yet living to confirm the truth of it; and if the calamities that were foretold, had not come to paſs. There were ſeen up and down in the air, before ſun-ſet, chariots and armed men, all over the country, paſſing along with the clouds round about the city.

Chariots, and armed men ſeen in the air.

Upon the feaſt of Pentecoſt, as the prieſts were going to officiate in the inner temple according to cuſtom, they heard at firſt a kind of a confuſed murmur; and after that, a voice calling out earneſtly in articulate words, "Let "us be gone, let us be gone."

A voice crying in the air, let us be gone.

But I come now to a ſtory that paſſes all the reſt. About four years before the war, when the city was in a profound peace, and flowing in plenty, there was one Jeſus the ſon of Ananus, a plain country fellow, who coming to the feaſt of tabernacles, (an annual feaſt to the honour of God) broke out on a ſudden into this exclamation over and over. "A "voice from the eaſt, a voice from the weſt, "a voice from the four quarters of the world, "a voice to Jeruſalem, and a voice to the "temple; a voice to new marry'd men and "women, and a voice to this whole nation."

A ſtrange exclamation of one Jeſus a poor country fellow.

This was his cry day and night, from place to place, thorough every ſtreet of the city. Some great men in the government took ſuch offence at ſo ill boding a liberty, that they order'd the man to be taken up and ſeverely whipt. He took the puniſhment without returning ſo much as one word, either by the by, or in his own defence, or to complain of hard meaſure; but ſtill he continued to repeat the ſame things over and over again, calling and denouncing as before. The magiſtrates began now to ſuſpect (as they had reaſon for it) ſomewhat of a divine impulſe in what he ſaid; and that he ſpoke by an extraordinary ſpirit. He was carry'd upon this, to Albinus the governor of Judea; who cauſed him to be laſh'd to the very bones, which he took without either tears or ſupplication: only in a mournful voice, as well as he could, he follow'd every ſtroke, with a Woe, woe to Jeruſalem! Albinus, as his judge, began to ask him who he was, whence he came, where he was born, and what he meant by that way of proceeding? But he gave him no anſwer. This was his way all along, till Albinus was fain to diſcharge him at laſt as a mad-man. From that time to the beginning of the war, he was never known to viſit or ſpeak to any of the citizens; or to make uſe of any other than that doleful form of words Woe, woe to Jeruſalem! He never gave an ill word to thoſe that daily ſcourged him, or a good one even to thoſe that fed him: but his anſwer was to all people alike, an ominous preſage. He was obſerved to be ſtill more clamorous upon feſtivals, than upon other days; and at this rate he went on for ſeven years and five months; without either his voice or his ſtrength failing him, till the ſiege of Jeruſalem verify'd his predictions. After this, he took the tour of the wall once again, crying out (with a ſtronger voice than ordinary) Woe, woe to this city, this temple, and this people! concluding at laſt with a Woe, woe be to me myſelf! And in this inſtant he was taken off with a ſtone from an engine, in the middle of all his forebodings.

The man puniſh'd, but ſtill continues his out-cry.

He is diſcharged at laſt as a mad-man.

Fore-boding alſo in the end his own deſtruction.

Here is enough ſaid to convince and ſatisfy mankind, that our deſtruction is from ourſelves, and that providence is wanting in nothing to us, that may conduce to the common good and benefit of reaſonable nature: as well by the means of foreſight and revelation, as by the aid and faculty of reaſon. But when we are precautioned of future events, and will take no warning, our ruin lies at our own door. How came the Jews, after the taking of Antonia, to make the temple ſquare, when they were conſcious to themſelves of a prediction in holy writ, that temple and city ſhould be both taken, whenever it ſhould be reduced to that figure? But the chief motive to this unfortunate war, was the ambiguity of another text, importing that in thoſe days there ſhould one come out of Judea that ſhould have the command of the whole world. Now they apply'd this to their own nation, and many great men fell into the ſame error: but this prophecy, in truth, was intended of Veſpaſian; who was created emperor in Judea. But interpretations go by fancy; ſome one way, ſome another: and ſo it far'd with Jews, till they came in the end to pay for their miſtakes, with the irreparable deſtruction of themſelves, and of their country.

The prophecy of an emperor to come out of Judea expounded of Veſpaſian, by Joſeph.

to it being in flames, the Romans lodg'd their enſigns againſt the eaſtern gate; where they offered ſacrifice, and with great ſhouts and acclamations, proclaimed Titus emperor. They got ſo prodigious a booty, that gold in Syria was brought down upon it to half the prize.

The force of drought and famine.

THERE was a child among the prieſts upon the wall, that begged of the Roman guards only a draught of water to quench his thirſt: which they freely gave him, out of a tenderneſs both to his age and to his neceſſity, upon promiſes of good faith on both ſides. The child went down and drank, and then filled a flagon that he carried along with him, and made ſuch haſte back with it to his friends, that the guards could not overtake him. The Romans charged the boy with breach of articles; but he pleaded for himſelf, that he covenanted only for liberty to fetch the water, not to continue with them when he had it, and conſequently had broken no conditions. They found the fraud ſo innocent, that they were well enough content to be ſo cozen'd.

WHEN the prieſts had ſtayed five days longer upon the wall, they were forced to come down, and deliver up themſelves by the extreme neceſſity of an outragious hunger. The guards took them to Titus, where they caſt themſelves at his feet for mercy. But his anſwer was, they ſhould have thought of that ſooner: for now the temple was gone, it was but reaſonable the prieſts ſhould go too, and that they and their temple ſhould be inſeparable. Upon this, Titus ordered the prieſts to be put to death.

Titus orders certain prieſts to be put to death.

THE heads of the faction, finding themſelves preſſed on all hands, and ſo ſurrounded that it was impoſſible to come off, propoſed a conference with Ceſar; who, out of his natural generoſity and goodneſs, inclined to entertain it; partly out of a deſire to ſave the town, and partly at the inſtance of his friends, in hope that the rebels might be brought to better terms for the future. Titus made a ſtand at the weſt ſide of the inner temple, near the gates that lead into the gallery; and there was a bridge of communication betwixt the temple and the upper town, which at this time parted the Romans and the Jews. The ſoldiers gathered together on both ſides about their generals: the Jews on the one hand, to learn what hope of pardon; and the Romans on the other, out of curioſity to ſee how Titus would receive them: who in the firſt place commanded peace and ſilence, and that his men ſhould forbear all hoſtilities, and ſhouting; after which he deliver'd his mind to them by an interpreter; giving thereby to underſtand that he had a right to ſpeak firſt.

The faction deſperate, and deſire a treaty.

Titus entertains the motion.

How can " you expect a pardon for yourſelves, that " would not ſo much as pardon your own " temple? and here you preſent yourſelves in " arms too, without ſo much as pretending to " be ſupplicants. But to come now to the " ground of this miſerable confidence. Your " people have neither heart nor ſoul left them; " your temple's gone, the city mine, and your- " ſelves all at my mercy; and yet you would " be thought to inſiſt upon terms of honour " now at laſt. But not to ſtand expoſtulating " any longer with your pertinacious follies, " lay down your arms, and render yourſelves, " and I am yet content to give you your lives: " and as in a private family a gentle maſter in- " flicts puniſhment upon ſtubborn offenders ad- " equate to the nature of their crimes; ſo " when I've once done neceſſary juſtice upon " the main, you ſhall find me merciful as to " the reſt." The faction return'd him this an- ſwer: " That they could not deliver them- " ſelves up, upon any promiſe or aſſurance he " could give them, becauſe they were under an " oath to the contrary; but that they were " ready to be gone, if he pleas'd, with their " wives and children into the deſart, and leave " the town to the Romans." Titus took it ſo heinouſly to ſee priſoners giving law, and im- poſing conditions upon the conquerors, that he preſently cauſed proclamation to be made, " That no Jew ſhould preſume for the future " to make any further application to Titus, or " expect either protection, or quarter; but " that they might now defend themſelves by " arms as well as they could; for Ceſar was " reſolv'd to govern himſelf by the rules of " war." So the ſoldiers had leave given them to fall on with fire and ſword, and make their beſt of the ſpoil of the city. There was no- thing done that day; but the next morning they ſet fire to the regiſter-office, the caſtle, the council-chamber, and a place call'd O- phlas: and ſo the fire ſpread to queen Helen's palace in the middle of the mount, deſtroying all before it, together with the dead bodies, with which the houſes and ſtreets were croud- ed full.

Titus offers them terms, which they refuſe, under pretence of an oath to the contrary.

Order'd upon this, that no Jew ſhall be allow'd either protection, or quarter.

The Romans fall on with fire and ſword, and take the ſpoil to themſelves.

ON the ſame day, the ſons and brethren of king Izates, with ſeveral other perſons of ho- nour, join'd in a petition to Ceſar for their lives; who, according to his uſual practice, granted the petition, though very much in- cens'd againſt the party. But they were all order'd to priſon, and the ſons and near re- lations of Izates carry'd afterwards bound to Rome for hoſtages.

Titus tender and good natur'd to the laſt.

Joſeph gives good advice, but it is loſt upon them. Sinks and vaults are ſearched for deſerters, and they kill all they take. No death ſo ghaſtly as that of a famine. The laſt hope of the faction is in their hiding-holes.*

THE rebels ſteer'd their courſe next to the royal palace, a ſtrong and a ſafe place, with a great treaſure laid up in it. The Jews beat the Romans out of the houſe, kill'd all their countrymen that they found there, to the number of near eight thouſand four hun- dred perſons, and carry'd off all the money. Upon this encounter, there were two Roman ſoldiers taken alive, a horſe-man and a foot- man: the latter was kill'd, and dragg'd along the ſtreets quite through the town, as if it had been to revenge the whole nation upon that ſingle body. The horſe-man, upon a pretence that he had ſomewhat of moment to communi- cate, was carry'd to Simon; and having no- thing to ſay when he came there, order was given to Ardalas, one of Simon's officers, to have him put to death. So he was preſently taken out with his hands bound behind him, and a ſwathing-band over his eyes, to have his head cut off within ſight of the Romans; but as the executioner was drawing his ſword to do his office, the priſoner ſtarted away, and made his eſcape over to the Romans. Titus would not ſuffer him to be put to death, for making his eſcape from the enemy; but look'd upon it as ſuch an indignity to have a Roman ſoldier taken alive, that he was diſarm'd and caſhier'd upon it; which to a man of honour is worſe than death.

The faction moves to the palace royal, a place of great ſtrength They cut off eight thou- ſand four hundred per- ſons there, and ſeize all their treaſure

A Roman point of ho- nour.

IT being the Romans fortune next day to rout the Jews out of the lower city, they put all in a blaze as far as Siloah; and had the plea- ſure of ſeeing what havock the conflagration made; but the booty was gone; for the ruf- fians had diſpos'd of that already into the up- per town. Now they were not a people to repent repent of any miſchief they had ever done, and they kept up their arrogance in the worſt of fortunes. The burning of the city was to them a ſpectacle of joy; and they declar'd that, as matters ſtood at that time, they were ready to welcome death itſelf with comfort; for now the people were waſted, and almoſt totally cut off, the temple burnt to aſhes, and the town all in a flame, there was nothing left for the Romans that were to come after them to joy in.

The conflagration ſerves them but for a ſpectacle.

Joſeph gives good advice to little purpoſe.

BUT while things were at this paſs, Joſeph did all that was to be done to ſave the miſerable remains of a ruin'd and a deſolated city; dividing himſelf in his applications, betwixt invectives againſt the impious inhumanities of the one ſide, and ſeaſonable encouragements and good counſels on the other: but it was all to no purpoſe; for he Jews were both ty'd up by their oath, and as good as beſieg'd by the overpowering number of the Romans; beſide, that their ſwords were wonted to blood and ſlaughter.

Sinks and vaults are ſearched for deſerters; and they kill all they take. No death ſo ghaſtly as that of famine.

IN this diſtraction, they ſcatter'd themſelves all over the city; hunting, and watching up and down in the ruins, vaults, and elſewhere, for deſerters. They took a great many of them, and they kill'd all they took (for they were too weak to run for it) and their dead they caſt to the dogs; but of all deaths, famine was the moſt frightful and ghaſtly. There were ſeveral that went over to the Romans, without either the hope, or deſire, of any other mercy from them, than what they promis'd themſelves in the exchange of one death for another: and this was the caſe with the ſeditious alſo upon the ſame account. The ſtreets were cover'd with dead bodies from one end of the city to the other, which were either murder'd or ſtarv'd.

The laſt hope of the faction is in their hiding holes.

THE laſt hope of the tyrannical faction, was in the receſſes of ſinks and privies, upon a vain fancy that they might lie conceal'd there till all ſhould be over, and the Romans gone; and that they might make their eſcape; not conſidering that holes and hiding-places are no proof againſt the all-ſeeing eye of juſtice. The Jews that were poſſeſs'd of theſe ſubterranean retreats, did more miſchief than the Romans by the fire; killing and robbing all they could meet, that came for ſanctuary to thoſe caverns: and let their food be never ſo coarſe or foul, ſuch was their neceſſity, that it became a cauſe of quarrel; inſomuch that I verily believe, if the ſiege had continu'd, the living would have been inhuman enough to eat the fleſh of the dead.

The upper town not to be taken without new mounts.

THE upper town was ſeated upon ſuch crags and precipices, that Titus found it utterly impoſſible to gain it without new mounts; ſo that upon the twentieth of the month * Lous, he went in hand with the project. Carriage was extremely difficult and troubleſome, (as I have ſaid elſewhere;) for the materials were all cut down for the former works, within an hundred † furlongs of the town. The four legions threw up a mount on the weſt ſide of the town, over againſt the palace royal: the auxiliaries and the reſt caſt up another toward the galleries, and the bridge, and a fort that Simon built in his war with John, known by the name of Simon's tower.

Titus ſets the project a foot.

The Idumeans offer their ſervice to Titus by their deputies, and beg his pardon.

Titus grants their requeſt.

But Simon immediately puts the deputies to death.

At the ſame time the Idumean officers conſulted together among themſelves how to deſert, and get over to the Romans, and ſent five deputies with a tender of their ſervice to Titus, and a ſubmiſſive petition for mercy in the name of the reſt. Though this came late, yet Titus however, upon an opinion that Simon and John would be obliged to ſurrender themſelves, after ſuch a deſertion, ſent the deputies back with a promiſe of their lives; for he looked upon the Idumeans as the moſt conſiderable part of their army. This plot, it ſeems, had taken air, and Simon cauſed the five deputies immediately to be put to death, and their leaders impriſoned, reckoning James the ſon of Soſas for the chief. And though much could not be expected from the common ſoldiers, now the officers were gone, the reſt of the Idumeans were kept yet under a ſtricter guard; and all not ſufficient to hinder them from deſerting. There were many cut off, 'tis true; but more that eſcaped; and they were all received; for Titus had too much generoſity and good nature to preſs his former prohibition to the uttermoſt rigour; and the very ſoldiers themſelves, betwixt the hope of booty, and a glut of blood, began to exerciſe more humanity and moderation.

Whole families ſold like herods of beaſts in a market.

Titus ſets upward of forty thouſand men at liberty that came over to him.

As for the common people, (which were all that were now left) they were ſold with their wives and children, like beaſts in a market; and at very eaſy rates too, there being but few purchaſers. Titus reflecting upon this, and upon his own proclamation, whereby he had forbad any more Jews to come over to him ſingle, out of a deſire to ſave as many of them as he could, he was now pleaſed to diſpenſe with his own order, and to receive as many of them, one by one, as preſented themſelves: but with ſuperviſors over them, to diſtinguiſh the good from the bad, and to deal with them according to their merits. There were vaſt numbers of them ſold, and upward of forty thouſand ſet at liberty by Titus, to go whither they would.

Jeſus, a prieſt, the ſon of Thebuth, articles with Ceſar for his life, upon diſcovery of holy plate and veſſels belonging to the temple.

THERE was at the ſame time one Jeſus, a prieſt, and the ſon of Thebuth, who compounded with Ceſar for his life, upon condition to deliver up to him ſome of the veſſels, donatives, and other ornaments, belonging to the holy temple. So he went out, and gave him over the wall two candleſticks, like thoſe

Phineas, the treaſurer makes alſo a farther diſcovery.

THERE was alſo taken, one Phineas, the keeper of the holy treaſure; who produced a great many prieſts habits and girdles, purple and ſcarlet ſtuffs, that were orderly folded up for uſe. There was alſo a proportion of cinnamon, caſſia, gums, and perfumes, for daily incenſe: beſides ſeveral ſorts of holy ornaments and private goods. But for the ſake of this ſervice, though the man was a fair priſoner of war, and taken by force, he was treated yet as if he had voluntarily deſerted to them, and that all he did had been out of pure good will.

The mounts are finiſh'd: and the Romans advance with their machines. Some ſhift for themſelves: and others ſtand their ground. Simon and John in horror and deſperation with frightful ſtories and falſe alarms. They give up three forts, that could never have been taken but by ſtarving, which did the whole work. The Romans carry all before them; and the Jews like vipers eat out the belly of their mother. A pious ejaculation of Titus's. He erects a monument to his good fortune. Titus gives orders about his priſoners.

The mounts are now finiſhed: and the Romans advance with their machines.

THE works being now finiſh'd, on the ſeventh of the month * Gorpicus, (having been eighteen days a doing) the Romans advanced their machines; and that part of the faction, that deſpaired of holding out, quitted the walls, and withdrew to the caſtle; others into privy houſes and vaults: but the more reſolute ſtopp'd, and made head againſt thoſe that were to manage the battery: the enemy all this while being ſuperior to them, both in ſtrength and number; over and above the advantage of men in heart, and puffed up with ſucceſs, againſt a ſad, a deſpairing, and an unfortunate people. So ſoon as ever they took notice of any flaw in the wall, or that any of the turrets gave way to the engines, the deſendants ſhifted immediately away as faſt as they could: inſomuch, that Simon and John themſelves were ſeized with a panick terror, and ready to fly, even before the Romans were come within diſtance of doing them any hurt. It would have grieved a body's heart, though for the vileſt of miſcreants, to ſee thoſe men trembling and knocking their knees, as if they were ſinking into the ground, that had been but juſt before puff'd up to the higheſt degree of arrogance and preſumption, both in words and actions. Never ſo wonderful a change! They made an attempt indeed upon the wall of circumvallation that the Romans raiſed about the town. In ſhort, they attacked it, and made a breach in it; with a reſolution to fall upon the guards and make an eſcape: but perceiving, when they look'd to be ſeconded, that their friends had all forſaken them, they hurried away in confuſion, as their fears and their neceſſities mov'd them. In this phantaſtical variety of frightful apprehenſions, every man framed a ſtory according to his imagination. One brings news that the whole wall to the weſtward, was overthrown; others, that the Romans were juſt at the foot of it: ſome, that they were entered, and ſuch and ſuch of them ſeen in poſſeſſion of the towers. Whatever they feared, they ſaw; falling proſtrate upon their faces, and bemoaning their follies in a paſſion, as if they had been thunder-ſtruck, not knowing which way to turn themſelves.

Miſled by frightful ſtories and falſe alarms:

THE power of God on the one hand, and his goodneſs on the other, was very remarkable upon this occaſion; for the tyrants ruined themſelves, by quitting thoſe holds of their own accord, that could never have been taken but by famine; and this, after the Jews had ſpent ſo much time to no purpoſe upon other pieces of leſs value. By this means, the Romans became maſters of three impregnable forts, by fortune, that could never have been taken any other way: for the three famous towers formerly mentioned, were proof againſt all battery.

And infatuated into giving up of three forts, that could never have been taken but by ſtarving.

The quitting of theſe three towers did the whole work.

UPON Simon and John's quitting theſe towers; or rather, upon their being driven out of them by the impulſe of a judicial infatuation, they haſtened away to the vale of Siloa, where they took breath a while; and after ſome recollection and refreſhment, they gave an aſſault to the new wall there: but ſo faint and weak, that the guards beat them off; for betwixt fatigue, deſpondency, dread, and miſery, their ſtrength failed them, and they were then ſcattered ſeveral ways into ſinks and common ſewers.

THE Romans being now poſſeſſed of the walls, planted their enſigns upon the towers with outcries and ſhouts of joy, to find the end of the war ſo much eaſier than the beginning: if at leaſt the war was now at an end, which they could not well doubt of, without diſtruſting their own eyes.

The Romans carry all before them, to the extremities of fire and blood.

THE ſoldiers having gained the laſt wall without bloodſhed, could hardly believe it was the laſt, and were not a little ſurprized to meet with no oppoſition; whereupon dividing themſelves, they rang'd through every ſtreet in the town, with their ſwords drawn; killing all that fell in their way without diſtinction, and burning entire houſes, and whatever was in them, in one common flame. In ſeveral places, where they entered to ſearch for pillage, they found whole families dead, and the houſes cramm'd with hunger-ſtarved carcaſſes: ſo that upon the horror of ſo hideous a ſpectacle, they came out again empty-handed; but the compaſſion they had for the dead, made them not one jot tenderer to the living; for they ſtabbed every man they met, till the narrow paſſages and alleys were choaked up with carcaſſes: ſo that the chanels of the city ran blood, as if it had been to quench the fire. In the evening, they gave over killing, and at night fell afreſh to burning.

THE eighth of the month Gorpieus put an end to the conflagration of Jeruſalem; and if all the bleſſings it ever enjoyed from the foundation of it, had but been comparable in proportion to the calamities it ſuffer'd in this ſiege, that city had been undoubtedly the envy of the world. But the greateſt plague of all came out of its own bowels, in that infernal race of vipers that it brought forth, to eat out the belly of the mother.

WHILE Titus was now taking a view of the ruins of this glorious city, the works, the fortifications, and eſpecially the turrets, which the tyrants had ſo ſottiſhly abandoned; while Ceſar, I ſay, was entertaining himſelf in the contemplation of the height, dimenſions, and ſituation of theſe towers, the deſign, workmanſhip, and curioſity of the fabrick, with the wonderful contrivance of the whole, he let fall this expreſſion: "Well! (ſays he) if God "had not fought both for us, and with us, "we could never have been maſters of theſe "forts. It was God, in fine, that aſſiſted us, "and fought for us, by drawing the Jews "from theſe ſtrong holds: otherwiſe what "power of men and machines could ever have "been able to have prevailed againſt theſe "fortifications?" When Titus had ſaid this, and great deal more upon the ſame ſubject, in the hearing of his friends, it was his next care to ſet all the priſoners at liberty that the tyrants had left in the towers: and afterwards, upon the razing and demoliſhing of the city, to preſerve thoſe turrets as a monument to the honour of his good fortune; without whoſe aſſiſtance he could never have done what he did.

A pious ejaculation of Titus's to the honour of providence.

A monument erected to his good fortune.

THE ſoldiers being very much fatigued with doing execution, and there being a great number of Jews ſtill ſurviving, Titus ordered his men to hold their hands, and to diſpatch none but ſuch as they found arm'd, or in a poſture of reſiſtance, and to give quarter to all reſt. But the ſoldiers went beyond their commiſſion, and put the aged and the ſickly to the ſword promiſcuouſly, with their companions; and for thoſe that were ſtrong and ſerviceable, they ſhut them up in the temple, in the womens quarter; Ceſar appointing Fronto, one of his friends and freemen, to inform himſelf of the people, and to do by them as they deſerved. As for the ruffians, and the ſeditious, that impeach'd one another, he had them all put to death: but for men of comely and graceful perſons, and in the prime of their youth, he reſerved them for the triumph: ſending away all the remainder of them, who were above ſeventeen years old, into Egypt, to be employ'd in ſervile offices and drudgery: beſide thoſe that were diſtributed up and down the provinces, for the uſe of the theatres, in the quality of ſwordmen or gladiators; and all under ſeventeen, were expoſed to ſale.

Titus gives order about the priſoners.

IN the mean time, while the priſoners were under Fronto's charge, there were eleven thouſand of them ſtarved to death; partly through the churliſhneſs of their keepers, that refuſed to give them meat; and partly through the ſqueamiſhneſs of their own ſtomachs that could not deſpenſe with it: but in truth, the mouths were too many for the proviſion.

The number of the dead, and of the priſoners, in this war. John and Simon taken: the one kept for the triumph, the other a priſoner for life. The city a heap of aſhes, and the walls thrown down.

THE number of priſoners in this war was ninety ſeven thouſand: the number of the dead was eleven hundred thouſand; the greater part of them Jews by nation, though not natives of Judea: for it was only a general meeting of them at Jeruſalem, gathered together from all quarters to celebrate the feaſt of the Paſſover, who were there ſurprized into a war. There was ſo prodigious a multitude, and they ſo ſtreighten'd for lodgings, that the crowd firſt brought the plague into the town, and then quickly made way for a famine. Not but that the city was abundantly capable yet of entertaining that vaſt body of people, if the calculation of Ceſtius at leaſt may paſs for any thing; as follows.

The number of the dead and of the priſoners in this war.

NERO had ſo great a contempt for the Jews, that Ceſtius made it his ſuit to the high-prieſt to bethink themſelves ſome way of numbering their people: and this he did out of a deſire to give Nero to underſtand, that the Jewiſh nation was not ſo deſpicable as he imagined; ſo that they took their time to enter upon the computation, at the celebration of their paſchal feaſt; when offering up ſacrifices according to cuſtom, from the ninth* hour of the day to the eleventh, and thoſe ſacrices to be eaten afterwards in their families, by ten at leaſt, and ſometimes twenty to a lamb: they reckoned upon two hundred fifty five thouſand and ſix hundred oblations; which, at the rate of ten to a lamb, amounted to two millions five hundred and fifty ſix thouſand perſons, all clean and ſound; for neither lepers, ſcorbuticks, men troubled with gonorrhea's, women in their monthly ſickneſs, or people labouring under any maligant diſtempers, were admitted to any part in this ſolemnity; no more were any ſtrangers, but what came thither for religion. So that this mighty concourſe of people from abroad before the ſiege, was afterwards by the righteous providence of God, cooped up in the city as in a priſon: and the number of the ſlain in that ſiege was the heavieſt judgment of the kind that ever was heard of. Some were killed openly; others kept in cuſtody by the Romans, who ſearced the very ſepulchres and vaults for them, and put all they found alive to the ſword. There were upward of two thouſand, that had either laid violent hands on themſelves, or killed one another by conſent; beſide thoſe that periſh'd by famine. The putrid corruption of the dead bodies ſent out a vapour to poiſon as many as came with in reach of it. Some were not able to endure it, and went out of the way; others had their hearts ſo ſet upon booty, that they rifled the very carcaſſes, and trampled upon the dead bodies as they lay ſoaking in their corruption. But avarice ſticks at nothing. They brought out ſeveral priſoners alſo that the two tyrants had laid in chains there; for they kept up their cruelty to the laſt: but God's juſtice overtook them both in the end; for John and his brethren in the vaults, were now driven by the diſtreſs of an inſupportable hunger, to beg that mercy of the Romans, that they had ſo often deſpiſed; and Simon, after a long ſtruggle with an insuperable necessity (as we shall shew hereafter) deliver'd up himself: the latter being reserved for the triumph, and John made a prisoner for life. The Romans, after this, burnt the remainder of the city, and threw down the walls.

The remainder of the city laid in ashes, and the walls thrown down.

Jerusalem taken and destroyed. Melchizedeck the first founder of it; who gave it the name of Jerusalem, in exchange for Solyma. The city laid all in rubbish.

Jerusalem taken, and destroy'd.

THUS was Jerusalem taken, and utterly destroy'd, in the second year of Vespasian, and on the eighth day of the month * Gorpieus; having been five times taken before, i. e. by Azocheus, king of Egypt; Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria; Pompey, and Herod, with Sosius; who did all preserve the city after it was taken. But Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, laid it waste, thirteen hundred sixty years, eight months and six days after the building of it.

Melchizedeck the first founder of it.

THE first founder of it was a Chanaanitish prince, called Melchizedeck, which in the Hebrew language signifies a just king; for such he was in an eminent manner. † He first dedicated this city to God; erected a temple in it, and officiated in the quality of a priest; giving it the name of Jerusalem, which before was called Solyma.

WHEN David the king of the Jews came afterwards to drive out the Channaanites, he planted his own people there: and in four hundred ‡ seventy seven years and three months, after this, it was laid waste by the Babylonians.

FROM the reign of David there, to the destruction of the city by Titus, it was eleven hundred and seventy § nine years; and two thousand one hundred seventy seven years from the foundation of it. But neither antiquity, wealth, fame, nor the honour of the religion itself, was any security against the appointments of fate.

THIS was, in fine, the issue of the siege: and when the soldiers had neither rapine nor bloodshed for their spleens to work upon, (as they would not have been idle, if they had had matter) Titus ordered them to lay the city and temple level with the ground; and to leave nothing standing, but the three famous towers, Phasael, Hippicos, and Mariamne, that over-top'd all the rest; and a piece of a wall to the westward of the town, where he designed a garison: the towers to remain as so many monuments to posterity of the Romans power and conduct in the taking of them. This order was punctually executed; and all the rest laid so flat, that the place looked as if it had never been inhabited. This was the end of the Jerusalem faction; a mad and a seditious people: and this was also the end of the most glorious city of the universe.

The city laid level with the ground.

Titus provides for the honour and reward of those that behaved themselves bravely in the war. A generous speech of his to his soldiers, accompany'd with bounties and presents. Titus offers a thanksgiving sacrifice for his victory.

CESAR having now determined to leave the tenth legion in garison in Jerusalem, with some squadrons and battalions of horse and foot, and having discharged all the parts of a vigilant and a careful general, he came now to bethink himself of encouraging and rewarding those that had signaliz'd themselves in his service. Now to this end, he mounted a tribunal, with the choice of his great officers about him, at the head of his camp, and upon an eminence where he might best be heard; and from thence deliver'd himself to his army in terms to this effect.

Titus provides, now the war is over, for the honour and reward of those that served him in it.

Titus to his soldiers.

"It is impossible, says he, my brave fellow-soldiers, to express how kindly I take "the generous faith and respect you have "been pleas'd to pay me all along this war. "And so he enter'd upon the topicks of their "orderly discipline and obedience; their invincible firmness and resolution upon all "occasions, and in the most pressing of dangers; the reputation they acquir'd in advancing the honour, and enlarging the territory of their country: and finally, in giving all men to understand, that neither "odds of numbers, advantages of forts, "strength of places, power of populous cities, "the precipitate madness, or the outragious "fury of brutal adversaries, can ever discompose the Roman conduct and courage. "Not but that now and then by fits, the Jews "have had some favourable turns of fortune "too: but it is a great thing, however, says "he, to put an happy end to a war that has "been so long a foot; which is as much as "they could wish for themselves when they "first engaged in it. And it is a greater yet, "says he, to see your choice of the Roman "emperors and generals, not only admitted, "but universally and thankfully approv'd. "He could not, he said, but love and admire "them all for what they had worthily done: "but for those that made themselves exemplary in their adventures and hazards, and "in doing honour to their character and profession, it should be his care, he said, to do "them all manner of right in return: and "whoever shew'd an emulation to outdo his "fellows, should be sure of an acknowledg"ment in proportion; for he took much "more delight in preferringand advancing the "virtuous, than in punishing offenders."

TITUS, immediately upon this, call'd for an account from some of the officers that had the commission in charge, to know which of the soldiers had done any thing extraordinary in the war. They were produced one and one by name, highly commended, and Titus as much concern'd for their goods as for his own. From fair and obliging words, he pro-

He crown'd them with coronets of gold, dress'd them up with gold-chains, gave them lances pointed with gold, silver medals, and advanced every man in his quality and station. He gave them minted money in gold and silver out of the booty, with robes and other things of value. So soon as this distribution was over, to every man according to his merit, Cesar, accompany'd with the vows, prayers, and acclamations of the whole army, descended from his tribunal to offer sacrifices, and give thanks for his victory. There was a vast multitude of oxen there at hand about the altars, which were sacrificed and distributed to the army; Cesar himself feasting his officers for three days. The troops, after this, were sent away to their respective quarters; and Jerusalem committed to the guard of the tenth legion, without sending it back to Euphrates, whence it came.

And offers a thanksgiving sacrifice for his victory.

TITUS had not as yet forgotten the affront the Jews put upon the Romans under Cestius; and so he sent away the twelfth legion, that had been formerly at Raphanea, to Melitene, that lies along the Euphrates upon the borders of Cappadocia and Armenia; keeping the fifth and fifteenth legions to himself, as a competent guard to convoy him into Egypt. From hence he took his passage to Cesarea upon the coast; but being winter, he durst not venture into Italy: so thrt he laid up his booty and treasure there for the present, and took care for the securing of his prisoners.

While Titus lay before Jerusalem, Vespasian visits several sea-ports. Simon the son of Gioras taken prisoner. The manner of taking him. He propounds to himself to make his escape thro' a vault, but the project would not do. Terentius Rufus seizes him, and puts him in chains. Simon gives light to farther discoveries. The birth-days of Domitian and Vespasian celebrated with great pomp.

While Titus lay before Jerusalem, Vespasian visits several of the sea-coasts.

DURING the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, Vespasian embark'd in a merchantman for Rhodes, where he took a galley, and so pass'd out of Ionia into Greece; visiting all the towns in his way, where he was most magnificently receiv'd: from thence to Corcyra, and so to Japygia; and thence he continu'd his journey by land. Titus was now come back from Cesarea upon the sea-coast, to that called Cesarea Philippi; where he made a considerable stay, entertaining himself and the people with all manner of publick shews: as combats betwixt men and beasts, man and man, troop and troop; which cost him the lives of a great many of his captives.

Simon the son of Gioras taken prisoner; and the manner of it. He contrives his escape thro' a vault.

IN this juncture Simon the son of Gioras happen'd to be taken, and the manner of it was this, Simon, upon the siege of Jerusalem, was forced into the upper town; and the Romans breaking into the city, put him to his wits end how to shift for himself. In this distress he call'd a council of his most trusty friends, consisting of miners, stone-cutters, smiths, and men well skill'd in iron-works; and having got a sufficient quantity of tools and materials for their purpose, together with provisions for a considerable time, they let themselves down into a dark and secret vault. When they had made their way as far as they could, and found the passage too narrow to receive them, they fell to digging and mining, in hope to work a way through, and so make an escape. But before they could advance any thing to speak of, their victuals fell short, and the plot fail'd; though they manag'd their stores the best they could. Simom had no way now left him, but to try if he could fright the Romans out of their senses; and so dressed himself up in a white garment buckled about him, and a purple cloak thrown over it. In this figure he presented himself out of the ground, from under the ruins of the late temple, to the amazement of the soldiers and others who first saw the apparition; but upon their approaching nearer and nearer, they took the heart to ask him his name, and who he was; and Simon refusing to tell them, call'd to speak with the captain of the guard. So Terentius Rufus, who had the command, was immediately fetch'd; who pumping the truth out of him, clapt him presently in chains, and gave Cesar afterwards an account of the whole story. Thus was this bloody tyrant, who had taken away so many of his countrymen's lives by subornation and false evidence, upon pretence of their going over to the Romans, brought to justice himself, and deliver'd into the hands of his enemies, without any force upon him, by his own act. But there is no avoiding the stroke of divine vengeance; no contending with the power of innocence and justice: and the punishment is yet the more grievous many times for being defer'd, and when people reckon themselves secure, and the danger over. This was Simon's case in the hands of the Romans; and his fantastical rising out of the ground prov'd an occasion of discovering divers of his companions in their hiding-places.

But his project fails him.

Terentius Rufus seizes him, and lays him in chains.

Simon gives occasion to farther discoveries.

UPON Cesar's returning back from Cesarea by the sea side, and the presenting of Simon to him in chains, he order'd Simon to be kept for his triumph at Rome. When he had been there a while, he set a day apart for the celebration of his brother Domitian's birth-day with a very splendid pomp, and a great number of his condemn'd prisoners dedicated to the honour of the solemnity; reckoning upon those that were destroy'd by beasts, fire, and in combat one with another, to be at least two thousand and five hundred in number: and all too little in the opinion of the Romans, who hated them mortally. Titus went afterward to Berytus, a city of Phenicia, and a Roman colony, where he also continu'd for some time, and kept his father's birth-day with more splendour and magnificence than the former, both for spectacles and other expensive entertainments.

And is himself reserv'd for a triumph at Rome.

The birth-days of Domitian and Vespasian celebrated with great pomp.

The Jews dispersed every where, especially in Syria and Antioch. The latter are numerous and wealthy. Antiochus, the son of a Jew, the ruin of the place. A raging uproar. Antiochus sets up the pagan worship, and suppresses the observance of the sabbath. The city takes fire; and Antiochus charges it falsly upon the Jews.

THE Jews in Antioch were terribly distress'd, the city being spitefully bent against them, as well upon the account of new matter, as for misdemeanours of former date. But it will be requisite to speak a word or two of this now by the way, in order to the better understanding of what is to come.

The Jews dispers'd over the face of the earth, in Syria especially, and more particularly in Antioch.

THE Jews are a people dispers'd over the face of the whole earth: particularly among the Syrians, as they are near neighbours; and more especially in Antioch; where there are great numbers of them, not only upon the account of its being a large and a populous city, but also by reason of the privileges and immunities they have enjoy'd there by the favour of the government ever since the days of Antiochus Epiphanes (as they call'd him) who laid waste the city of Jerusalem, and rifled the temple. The successors of this Antiochus caused restitution to be made to the Jews, of all the brazen vessels that had been taken away, and to be dedicated to the service of their synagogue at Antioch, allowing them the same freedom of the city with the Greeks; and they were likewise treated by the following kings after the same manner; their numbers encreasing, and their temple rich and flourishing: insomuch that several pagan proselytes came over to them, and incorporated with the nation.

Now upon the breaking up of the war, and Vespasian's passing by sea into Syria, the Jews made themselves extremely odious. As for instance: there was one Antiochus, the son of one of the most eminent Jews they had in Antioch, both for quality and power. This Antiochus, coming into the theatre upon a publick meeting, openly charg'd his father, and certain other foreign Jews, by name, in the face of the assembly, with a design to fire the city in the night. This transported the multitude into so outrageous an uproar, that they call'd immediately for fire, and burnt the pretended conspirators in the middle of the theatre. The rabble were presently for doing the same execution upon all the rest, and securing their country before it was too late. Antiochus did all he could to inflame the people's hatred more and more against them; and as an argument of the affection he had for the pagan worship, and his aversion to that of the Jews, he did not only sacrifice after the pagan manner himself, but forc'd others to do so too, upon pain of death to the refusers. Upon this difficulty, the Antiochians comply'd; but the Jews most of them stood out, and were put to death. Antiochus being by this time in a better condition to wreak his spite upon the Jews, having a command of soldiers given him by the Roman governor, he began upon the subject of the sabbath, with pressing people upon that point, and forcing them to work indifferently upon that day, as well as upon others; and carrying things on to that extremity, that the festival was not only laid aside in Antioch, but in danger to be quite abrogated likewise every where else.

THIS persecution of the Jews at Antioch, was immediately follow'd with another; which was this: The square market, with several offices for publick registries and records, and other stately buildings, happening all to take fire, the flame was so fierce, that there was great danger the whole city had been burnt to the ground. Antiochus laid it upon the Jews, and the Antiochians were apt enough to believe it, for the very sake of the late story; even if they had not been prepossess'd against them before-hand. For the impression upon them was so strong, that they could almost have sworn they had seen the Jews with their own eyes, in the very act of firing it. Now taking it for granted upon this presumption, they fell upon the persons accus'd, with so outrageous a fury, that Collega, the vice-governor to Cestennius Petus, was scarce able with all he could do to keep the people quiet, only till Cesar might be duly informed of the whole affair. Cestennius had his commission of governor already, but was not as yet come to his command. Now Collega, upon a strict examination of the matter, made it out as clear as the sun, that the persons accus'd by Antiochus were every man of them innocent. And this villany, in fine, was found to be the work of a few profligate spendthrifts, and men of desperate fortunes, that had no better way to secure themselves from their creditors, than by destroying the evidences. But the Jews were not yet without aking hearts for fear of what might be the issue even of a false accusation.

Titus overjoy'd at his father's safe arrival in Italy.

TITUS was at this time overjoy'd with the welcome news he receiv'd from his father, of his happy arrival in Italy, and with what joy and gladness the Italian cities had entertain'd him all the way as he pass'd: but the thing that transported him beyond all the rest, was the tenderness and the magnificence of his reception at Rome; which deliver'd the son from any farther anxiety for the prosperous successes of his father. The people pay'd Vespasian treated every where with infinite veneration and respect.

Vespasian at all distances, the same veneration as if he had been upon the place; and the passionate desire they had to see him, did in some measure supply for his absence in that interval. The senate, that had it fresh in their memories what miserable revolutions they had seen, upon the transferring of governments from one prince to another, reckon'd themselves happy in the blessing of an emperor that brought reputation, conduct, and experience, along with him into the administration: and the common people were no less pleas'd with the change; especially being at that time embroil'd in civil wars, and likewise in a further trust and confidence of being restor'd, by his means, to their antient freedom and plenty. And so for the military part, the soldiers hearts were set upon him above all others, for the proofs he had given them, upon several occasions, of his martial skill and courage; beside the sense of the shame and scandal they had suffer'd, under the indolence, unskilfulness, and laziness, of other commanders; concluding that no man was so fit or likely to set them right and recover their honour as Vespasian.

THIS prince was so universally belov'd, that the great men had not the patience to wait any longer for his coming at a distance, and so went out and met him a good way off from the city; and such numbers of people of all ranks follow'd them that more came out than stay'd behind. When Veſpaſian was advanc'd near the town, and word brought how all people were charm'd with the good graces of his affability and addreſs, the ways were all throng'd up with their wives and children, out of a longing curioſity to ſee him; breaking out into raptures of admiration all the way they went, at the ſweetneſs and gentleneſs of his mien and perſon; calling him alſo a thouſand benefactors, deliverers and protectors, and extolling him as the only prince under the ſun, that deſerv'd an imperial crown. The whole city, in fine, was ſo dreſs'd up and ſet out with garlands and perfumes, that it look'd like a temple; and the ſtreets ſo crouded, that there was hardly any paſſing to the palace: Veſpaſian, in the mean time, offering up to his houſhold-gods gratulatory ſacrifices of thankſgiving for his ſafe return; while the multitude gave themſelves up to feaſting with their tribes, families, and neighbours, wiſhing a long and a happy reign to Veſpaſian, and a continuance of the imperial ſovereignty to his ſon, and thoſe of the line, that ſhould come after him. This was the manner of Veſpaſian's entrance into Rome; and it was follow'd with all ſorts of felicity and good fortune.

Germany revolts. The occaſion of it. Caſſius and Civilis the ringleaders of a faction. Petilius Cerealis breaks the neck of the ſedition. Domitian puts an end to it without blood. The German rebellion follow'd with an incurſion of Scythians. Rubrius Gallus puts them all to the rout.

A LITTLE before Veſpaſian's coming to Alexandria, Titus being at that time before Jeruſalem, there happen'd a great revolt among the Germans; which was animated and encourag'd by their neighbours the Gauls, in hopes to ſhake off the Roman yoke. Now the Germans being naturally of a fiery temper, forward and inconſiderate, were apt enough of themſelves to engage in raſh undertakings: over and above that they were puſh'd on by a mortal hatred they had for the Romans, as the only power they fear'd: to which may be added a favourable conjecture of the times, in regard of the preſent factions and diviſions of the empire, upon ſo many turns and changes of government.

Germany revolts, and what mov'd them to it.

CASSIUS and Civilis, two perſons of eminent credit among the Germans, took advantage of theſe diſtractions, to advance a ſedition; which was in effect but what they had in their hearts long before. Upon ſounding the people how they ſtood affected, they found the greater part of them ready for miſchief; and in all probability the reſt would have follow'd their example, if it had not been for a divine providence that prevented it. Now the fact was this: Petilius Cerealis, formerly governor of Germany, received letters from Veſpaſian declaring him conſul; and with orders likewiſe to march forthwith into Italy, and take upon that command. While Cerealis was upon the way, he got notice of this inſurrection, march'd againſt the rebels as they were in a body, charg'd, and put them to the rout with a very great ſlaughter, and ſo recover'd the reſt to their wits again and their duty.

Caſſius and Civilis the heads of a faction.

Petilius Cerealis by providence breaks the neck of the ſedition.

BUT if this had not been done when it was, by Cerealis, the ſame thing would have been done very ſuddenly by another hand: for no ſooner was the noiſe of this rebellion come to Rome, but Domitian, the ſon of Veſpaſian, a pregnant young prince, that inherited the heroical ſpirit of his valiant father, put himſelf at the head of an army againſt theſe Barbarians; who were ſtruck with ſuch a terror upon the very rumour of his march, that they rendered themſelves immediately, without ſtriking a blow; reaping this advantage by it, that they reconcil'd themſelves to their old maſters without blood. When Gaul was ſettled, and out of danger of a relapſe, Domitian returned to Rome, laden with vows and acclamations for the wonderful ſervices he had done (even greater than could be expected for his years) to the honour both of himſelf and his country.

And Domitian puts a final end to it without blood.

THIS rebellion of the Germans was follow'd with a furious incurſion of the Scythians (or Samaritans) who venturing over the Danube by ſtealth, with a vaſt body of men, broke into Myſia, ſurprized ſeveral Roman gariſons, and with a mercileſs cruelty put them all to the ſword. They killed alſo the lieutenant general Fonteius Agrippa, a man of conſular authority, at the head of his troops; and ſo ran up and down, burning, waſting, and ravaging the whole province. So ſoon as this came to Veſpaſian's ear, and what havock had been made in Myſia, he diſpatch'd away Rubrius Gallus to call them to an account, who did very great execution upon them; and for thoſe that eſcap'd, they made a hard ſhift to get home: ſo that this war was quickly over, and the general took care to ſecure the paſſages thereabouts from any ſuch incurſions and attempts for the time to come.

The German rebellion is follow'd with an incurſion of Scythians.

Titus marches in triumph. The ſabbatical river: the courſe of it; and why ſo call'd. Antioch tranſported with joy at the coming of Titus. The people preſs to have the Jews baniſh'd out of that city, but Titus did not much heed it: the ſenate preſſes it over again, when Titus gives them a final refuſal, and goes his way for Egypt. Titus griev'd at heart to ſee the ſad condition of Jeruſalem. A vaſt treaſure bury'd in the ruins of it. Simon and John, and ſeven hundred graceful perſons more, ſet apart for the honour of the triumph. The order, the curioſity, and the magnificence of it. The ſolemnity ended in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. The death of Simon Gioras. Veſpaſian dedicates a temple to peace.

TITUS in his return from Berytus, after ſome ſhort ſtay there, (as we have ſaid before) treated all the towns, as he paſſed through Syria, with moſt magnificent ſhews; carrying his Jewiſh captives along with him, for the honour of his arms, and the ornament of his triumph.

Titus marches in triumph with his priſoners and his ſhews.

THIS prince took notice of a certain river in his journey, betwixt Arce and Raphane, two cities in the kingdom of Agrippa, that had ſomewhat in it very remarkable. While this this * river flows, it has a full ſtream and a ſtrong current: but on a ſudden the ſprings fail, and for ſix days it leaves the channel dry to the very bottom. On the ſeventh day, as if there had been no change, it fills again, and obſerves the ſame courſe as before. Hence it hath taken the name of the ſabbatical river, alluding to the ſeventh-day's feſtival of the Jews.

Antioch over joy'd at the coming of Titus.

When the people of Antioch underſtood that Titus was coming that way, they were ſo tranſported with the tidings, that men, women, and children, came thronging upwards of thirty † furlongs out of the town to meet him, out of an impatience to wiſh him joy, and bid him welcome upon the way. As he drew near, they made a lane for him to paſs, and ſo with all poſſible demonſtration of affection and reſpect they conducted him to the city; ſtill intermingling, with their ſhouts and acclamations, earneſt prayers and importunities, to baniſh all the Jews out of the city. Titus gave them the hearing, in ſuch a manner as if he did not much mind what they ſaid: however, the Jews were in great pain and trouble to think what might be the iſſue of it. Titus made no ſtay in Antioch, but went immediately to Zeugma, toward Euphrates; where he was attended with an embaſſy from Vologeſus the king of Parthia, and the compliment of a golden crown, to joy him of his victory over the Jews. Titus accepted the preſent, treated the embaſſadors, and ſo went back again to Antioch. He was no ſooner arrived there, but the ſenate and the magiſtracy invited him with great earneſtneſs to the theatre; which he very graciouſly comply'd with, and there found a might concourſe of the citizens waiting for his coming. The firſt thing they did was to renew their importunities to him afreſh for the expulſion of the Jews; to which Titus, with his ordinary preſence of mind, gave them this anſwer: "That their own "country being deſtroy'd, there was no other "to baniſh them to." When they ſaw this would not do, they tried him with another requeſt: that is to ſay, that the pillars of braſs, with the inſcriptions upon them of the Jews privileges, might be either removed or defaced. Titus would not intereſt himſelf in this neither; but left the Jews at Antioch in the ſame ſtate as he found them, and ſo went his way for Egypt.

The people rejects the baniſhing of the Jews out of that city.

Titus goes his way without minding them.

Titus gives them a final refuſal, and ſo away he goes for Egypt.

As he was upon his journey, and ſaw the miſerable deſolated condition of Jeruſalem, and the country all about it, he could not but compare within himſelf the difference betwixt a deſart and a paradiſe, a heap of rubbiſh and the moſt glorious pile of buildings under the heavens. Upon theſe thoughts, he could not but paſſionately deplore the deſtruction of ſo famous a city, and curſe the authors of the ſedition that were the cauſe of it: and ſo far was he from pretending to raiſe his reputation upon a publick calamity, that he could not forbear execrating the inſtruments that forced him upon this extremity.

The ſad ſtate of Jeruſalem goes to the heart of Titus.

A vaſt treaſure buried in the ruins of that city.

The city was infinitely rich, and a vaſt treaſure buried in the ruins of it, as gold and ſilver, and other precious goods to an ineſtimable value, that the owners had hid in the ground for fear of the enemy: ſome the Romans found out; but the greateſt diſcovery was made by the priſoners. Titus, being all this while upon his journey into Egypt, made what haſte he could over that forlorn waſted country to Alexandria, and ſo to embark from thence to Italy; ſending back the two legions that came along with him to their old quarters: that is to ſay, the fifth to Myſia, and the fifteenth into Hungary. But for Simon and John, the heads of the priſoners, and about ſeven hundred more of the propereſt and handſomeſt men, theſe were to be tranſported into Italy for the grace and glory of his triumph.

Simon and John, and ſeven hundred choice men more, reſerved for the grace of the triumph.

His paſſage to Rome was as fair and proſperous as he could wiſh, and the people treated him with the ſame offices of honour and reſpect as they had done his father: beſide that Veſpaſian himſelf had the goodneſs to go out with the reſt in perſon, and receive his ſon upon the way; which the people looked upon as an earneſt of greater bleſſings, to ſee the father and his two ſons brought together by ſo auſpicious a providence.

Some few days after this, the ſenate having reſolved upon two ſeveral triumphs apart, one for the father, the other for the ſon, in honour of their illuſtrious atchievements, Veſpaſian and Titus, this decree notwithſtanding, declar'd themſelves for contracting both triumphs into one. Upon the day of the ſolemnity, there was not a perſon in that populous city that did not go out to be a ſpectator: inſomuch, that when they were all placed, there was hardly paſſage for the emperors. The ſoldiers, with their officers at the head of them, march'd in very good order, before day, up to the gates, to wait the coming of the princes; not the upper palace gates, but thoſe near the temple of Iſis, where theſe heroes took up their lodging that night. At break of day, Veſpaſian and Titus ſtood forth, and advanced, with laurel crowns upon their

* Pliny in his natural hiſtory, b. xxxi. c. 2. aſſures us, that this river is dried up every ſabbath-day, and the Jewiſh Rabbines are of the ſame opinion. So that Caſaubon fancying the text of Joſephus to be corrupted, corrects it by tranſpoſing ſome words, and omitting others; according to his conjecture the tranſlation ſhould run thus: Nam quum ſit magnus quando fluit, feraturque impetu non leni per ſpatium ſex dierum, poſtea totus ab ipſis fontibus deficit, & die ſeptima ceſſat, præbetque alvei locum oculis ſpectandum, qui eſt ſiccus: deinde quaſi nulla facta eſſet mutatio, poſt diem ſeptimum erumpit, atque hunc ordinem exacte ſemper ab eo ſervari obſervatum eſt. i. e. This river has a very full and rapid ſtream, during the time it runs, which is for ſix days without intermiſſion; after which, its ſprings being quite exhauſted, it totally ceaſes on the ſeventh day, ſo as to leave the very bottom of the channel dry; but when the ſeventh day is over, as if there had been no change at all, it breaks out again; and then it exactly obſerves the ſame courſe as before. Gisb. Cuperus, without omitting any words, reads the text otherwiſe by a tranſpoſition. According to his emendation, the tranſlation is as follows; Feraturque impetu non leni per ſpatium ſex dierum; inde totus ab ipſis fontibus deficiens, ſiccum prebet ſpectandum alveum; & hinc, quaſi nulla facta eſſet Mutatio, ſimilis poſt ſeptimum diem erumpit. i. e. For ſix days it runs with a very ſtrong current; after which, its ſprings failing, it be comes dry to the very bottom, and continues ſo till the ſeventh day is over; and then as if there had been no change at all, it renews its uſual courſe as before. heads, heads, and purple robes, after the manner of their country, to the Octavian walks, where the ſenate, the nobility, and the Roman knights, waited for them. There was a tribunal erected before the portal, with ivory ſeats upon it, which they mounted; and ſitting down, were there ſaluted with the harangues and acclamations of the whole field. They were unarm'd, and, as I ſaid, crown'd with laurels, and cloth'd with purple. As they were going on, and amplifying upon the emperor's praiſes, Veſpaſian made them a ſign of ſilence; and then when all things were ſtill and quiet, Ceſar ſtood up, and covering part of his head with his garment, paſs'd certain ejaculatory vows and prayers according to cuſtom; and Titus did the like. Veſpaſian, after this, gave the whole auditory a ſhort ſpeech, and ſo diſmiſs'd the ſoldiers to dinner, who were in courſe to be entertain'd at the emperor's charge. He went next to the triumphal gate, (together with Titus) ſo call'd from the triumphal pomp paſſing that way; and then taking their repaſts, and putting on their triumphal habits, they ſacrific'd to their gods in the gate, and ſo led on the triumph through the middle of the ſpectacles, for the better view of the people, and the greater glory of the ſolemnity.

THE magnificence and the variety of theſe ſhews is not ſo much as to be imagined, and much leſs expreſs'd, whether for the nicety of workmanſhip, value, or novelty; for the whole ſtock of precious and agreeable rarities, that the happieſt of nations had been ſo many ages a gathering, met all together in this one day's triumph, to the honour of the tranſcendent dignity of the Roman empire. As for the choiceſt works that ever were ſeen or heard of, in gold, ſilver, or ivory, for price, or excellency, they were here ſo common and frequent, that they look'd liker a natural confuſion of things, than any part of a regulated pomp. And then for the admirable variety of purples, and Babylonian embroideries, jewels, and precious ſtones, ſome enchaſed into golden crowns, and ſome ſet out with other fancies, they were here ſo familiar and common, that they ſeem'd to be no longer a curioſity. They had the images of their gods alſo that were every way wonderful, both for ſize, art, and matter; and likewiſe the figures of ſeveral ſorts of living creatures, dreſs'd up ſuitably to their kind. They had alſo a vaſt number of people to carry all this, in cloth of gold and purple; and all thoſe that were ſet apart for the ſervice of the pomp, had their diſtinguiſhing ornaments of ſplendor and ſtate. Nay, the common ſort of the very priſoners themſelves, were not without ſomewhat that was graceful in their habit, to diſguiſe the miſery of their condition, and the marks of ſlavery that they wore in their faces. But nothing was more to be admir'd than the ordering of their machines, and how the bearers were able to ſupport them, being many of them three or four ſtories high: and the coſt was anſwerable to the artifice, for the hangings and and furniture were all wrought with gold, ivory, and the like. There were alſo ſuch repreſentations of war, and the circumſtances that attend it, that nothing was ever more to the life. Here was in one place the figure of a fruitful country laid waſte; in another, whole armies cut to pieces; ſome flying, others purſuing, or taken priſoners; ſtrong walls batter'd to the ground, forts demoliſh'd, breaches made in fortify'd cities, towns taken by aſſault, the ſtreets running blood, and the conquer'd begging quarter; temples burning, houſes beaten down upon the heads of their maſters, rivers lamenting their misfortunes, that inſtead of watering and refreſhing fields and meadows, and ſupplying drink to man and beaſt, they find themſelves forced to take their courſe through publick conflagrations. What was all this now, but a lively image of the ſufferings of the Jews; and ſo put together by art and fancy, that it may paſs for an inſtructive hiſtory of the ruin of that famous city, to thoſe that never knew more of it?

UPON every one of the pageants was repreſented the governor of the place that was taken, and the manner of taking it. The ſhipping came next; and then the ſpoils that were diſperſed up and down in ſeveral places. But the moſt conſiderable pieces, were the golden table, and the golden candleſtick, that were taken out of the temple of Jeruſalem; the former weighing ſeveral talents, and the other not applied to the uſe it was intended for. There was a kind of a pillar that came out of the foot of it; and out of that pillar, as from the ſtem of a tree, ſeven branches, and every branch having at the top the reſemblance of a lamp; the number of ſeven intimating the veneration the Jews have for their ſeventh day. After this, came the Jews law, which was the laſt trophy of their conqueſts that the Romans expos'd. This was followed by certain images of victory wrought out of ivory and gold. And laſt of all, to bring up the rear, came Veſpaſian himſelf, with Titus in the next place, and Domitian along with them on horſeback, well mounted, and well becoming the dignity of his ſtation. So they march'd together into the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there finiſh'd the triumph.

BEING now come to Jupiter's temple, they made ſome little ſtay there; it being according to antient practice ſo to do upon the like occaſion, till news ſhould be brought them that their enemies general was dead. This general was Simon Gioras (one of the priſoners that was led in triumph) who was drawn through the market-place with a rope about his neck, and put to death by thoſe that drew him, according to the Roman law and practice in the caſe of ſuch malefactors. Word being brought that Gioras was now dead, the whole field rang with ſhouts and acclamations, and ſo they betook themſelves to their vows and ſacrifices; and when the ſolemn part was over, the princes return'd to the palace, where they made a mighty treat; and there was nothing elſe all over the town but feaſting, rejoicing, and giving thanks for the final victory they had obtain'd over their enemies, to the glory of their generals, the end of civil broils, and the moral aſſurance of a publick repoſe.

The death of Simon Gioras.

WHEN theſe triumphs were over, and the empire ſettled, Veſpaſian erected a temple which he dedicated to peace. It was as rich as art and expence could make it, and the diſpatch of it, in ſo ſhort a time, was little leſs than a miracle. He ſpar'd for no coſt, over and above a collection of the choiceſt curioſities in painting and ſculpture to adorn it, inſomuch, that people flock'd from all quarters of the world to ſee the glory and the order of this admirable ſtructure. In this temple he depoſited the golden table and the candleſtick, as the rarities he valued moſt. And for the Jews law, and the purples belonging to the ſanctuary, they were lodg'd with great care and reverence in the palace.

Baſſus diſcharges the caſtle, and ſets Eleazar at liberty.*

WHEN Lucilius Baſſus had his commiſſion from Ceſar for lieutenant-general of Judea, he took upon him the command of the army from Cerealis Petilianus, and made himſelf maſter of the caſtle of Herodion by compoſition. After this, he drew his troops together that lay ſcatter'd up and down, propounding, with the help of the tenth legion, to reduce Macherus, as a thing abſolutely neceſſary to be done; for the ſtrength of that place would be a dangerous encouragement to a rebellion; and as the ſituation of it gave confidence to the town, ſo it ſtruck an awe, on the other hand, upon him that ſhould attempt it.

The ſituation of Macherus.

THE mountain that Macherus ſtands upon, is prodigiouſly high and rocky, to the degree of being almoſt impregnable. But nature hath made it well nigh inacceſſible too, by enclоſing it with vallies that are neither to be paſſed, nor to be fill'd up; and ſo deep likewiſe, that it is enough to make a perſon giddy-headed to look down at them. It reaches to the weſtward ſixty * furlongs in length, and borders upon the lake Aſphaltitis; and the caſtle hath an unbounded proſpect over all that quarter. On the ſouth and north, it is encompaſſed with vallies of the ſame dimenſions, and as ſecure from any attempt as the other. The depth upon the eaſt is at leaſt an hundred † cubits, and reaches to the mountain that is over againſt Macherus.

Herod the Great run up a ſtrong wall, and turrets about it

ALEXANDER, the king of the Jews, was the firſt that fortify'd this place, and rais'd a caſtle upon it, which Gabinius afterwards demoliſh'd in his war with Ariſtobulus; and then Herod the Great found it ſo well worth his care too, eſpecially againſt his neighbours the Arabians, who lay ſo conveniently to do him miſchief, that he ran a ſubſtantial wall about it with ſtrong turrets, erecting alſo a fair city there, which he cauſed to be peopled, and from thence carried a paſſage up to the caſtle itſelf. This caſtle he encompaſs'd at the top with another wall, and turrets at the corners, of ſixty ‡ cubits in height; and in the middle of all, he raiſed a large beautiful palace, which was abundantly ſupply'd with water from ſeveral ciſterns, wherever there was occaſion for it, as if nature and art had been at ſtrife, which of the two ſhould outdo the other; the one by ſituation, the other by improvement. He likewiſe furniſh'd this caſtle with ſo plentiful a magazine of arms, arrows, machines, and all ſorts of proviſions, for carrying on a war, that the gariſon ſhould never need to fear either force or famine.

Of the plants Rue and Baaras.

THERE was in this palace a plant they call Rue; of ſo wonderful a growth, that it was as tall and as well-ſpread as any fig-tree. It had been there, they ſay, ever ſince the days of Herod, and might have continued longer, if the Jews had not rooted it up upon taking the place.

IN the valley, on the north-ſide of Macherus called Baaras, there grows alſo a plant of the ſame name §. It is in appearance of a flame-colour; and toward the evening it caſts a light like the beams of the ſun. The root is not eaſily pluck'd up; but it draws back if any body offers at it; and the only way to fix it, is to ſprinkle it with the urine of a woman, or a little menſtruous blood. And when all this is done, it is yet certain death to touch it, without a piece of the root in your hand: though they talk in another way alſo of doing it without danger; and it is this. They dig round about the root till it is laid almoſt bare, and then tie a dog to the remaining part of it. The dog's maſter that tied him there, goes his way, and the dog following him, draweth the root after, and dies immediately, as if it were to redeem his maſter. After this it may be handled as ſecurely as any plant. But it has one other quality, that does more than countervail this difficulty. For the ſpirits that we call devils, are only the ſouls of wicked men, that have gotten poſſeſſion of living bodies, and would undoubtedly deſtroy them if they were not prevented: now this plant is a ſure remedy againſt theſe obſeſſions, and the very touching of the patient with it, cures him.

A ſtrange variety of ſprings and fountains.

IN the ſame place there is a wonderful diverſity of ſprings and fountains of very differing qualities and taſtes, as hot, bitter, ſweet, &c. And there are alſo cold ſprings intermingled one with another in the lower ground: but that which is moſt wonderful, is a ſhallow cave there at hand with a rocky ſtone over it, and the figure of two breaſts, like two fountains, coming out of it; the one diſcharging hot waters, and the other cold; and they make both together a moſt agreeable bath, which cures many diſeaſes, and eſpecially thoſe of the nerves. There are mines alſo of ſulphur and allum.

Baſſus beſieges Macherus.

place, propoſing to himſelf the filling up of the valley to the eaſt of the town, and the advancing of his approaches that way. The firſt thing he did, was to run up a mount againſt the caſtle, with all poſſible ſpeed, as the moſt likely way to facilitate the attempt: the Jews who were natives of the place ſeparated themſelves from the foreign Jews, and turn'd them off as a pitiful ſort of people, into the lower city, to ſtand the firſt ſhock; while they themſelves took charge of the caſtle, not only as the ſtronger and more defenſible of the two, but as a place where they might make better terms with the Romans in caſe of the worſt. They had a mind to try however what might be done to divert the ſiege; and there paſs'd not a day without reſolute ſallies and skirmiſhes, and a conſiderable loſs of men on both ſides; ſometimes one getting the better of it, and ſometimes the other: the Jews, when they fell upon the Romans by ſurprize; and the Romans, when they were aware of the Jews coming, and provided for them. But the ſiege was not to go off ſo, for there happen'd a ſurprizing accident, that put the Jews upon an abſolute neceſſity of giving up the caſtle.

Daily skirmiſhes.

THERE was in the place a bold, enterprizing, and daring young man, whoſe name was Eleazar. This Eleazar made ſeveral vigorous ſallies, and did all that was poſſible, both by his council and example, to obſtruct the progreſs of the Romans, and to put a check to their undertakings; inſomuch, that he made himſelf a terror to his enemies, as well as a comfort and ſupport to his friends: being the firſt man ſtill upon all encounters to attack, and the laſt, in caſe of a retreat, that came off. There paſs'd a skirmiſh one day, and when the action was over, and both parties withdrawn, Eleazar, in a vain-glorious contempt of danger, or of any man that ſhould dare to attack him, made a ſtop without the gate, and fell into a careleſs diſcourſe with ſome of the defendants upon the walls, without heeding any thing elſe. This being within view of the Roman camp, and one Rufus, an Egyptian, and a ſoldier, ſpying the opportunity, ran in upon him at unawares, ſeiz'd him, and carry'd him off, arms and all, into the enemy's quarter. Baſſus preſently order'd him to be ſtripp'd, and publickly whipp'd at his length upon the ground in ſight of the city. The Jews were ſo confounded at the calamity of this young man, that the whole multitude broke into tears and exclamations in pity of his diſtreſs. When Baſſus found the generality of the people ſo paſſionately concerned for the misfortune of one man, he computed with himſelf, that if he could but enflame their compaſſion, he might gain his point, and work them to a compoſition of giving up the place to ſave Eleazar's life. This fancy ſucceeded to his wiſh; for upon the ſetting up of a croſs, as if Eleazar were to be forthwith crucify'd, the timber was no ſooner planted, but the gariſon broke out into an outcry with one voice, That their affliction was altogether intolerable. Eleazar begg'd of them, upon this, to conſider both his caſe, who was now to die a wretched death, and their own; and not to contend any longer with the courage and fortune of the Romans, ſince the whole world had already ſubmitted itſelf to their empire.

A bold and memorable action of Eleazar's.

A notable thought.

THIS ſubmiſſion and ſupplication of Eleazar's, together with the powerful interceſſions of his friends and relations in the caſtle (for his family and intereſt was very conſiderable) ſoften'd the defendants into ſuch a tenderneſs, upon ſecond thoughts, that they ſent deputies immediately to the Romans, with propoſals to deliver up the caſtle, upon condition of diſcharging Eleazar, and leaving the gariſon at liberty to go whither they would. Baſſus made no difficulty of the terms: but the people of the lower town taking it ill, that an agreement ſhould be made without their privity, reſolved among themſelves to ſlip away that night by ſtealth. Upon the opening of the gates, Baſſus had notice of it from the caſtle, partly out of envy to their companions, and partly out of fear for themſelves, leſt they ſhould be thought of the party. But the braveſt however of thoſe that went firſt, got off; and the reſt, to the number of ſeventeen hundred men, were put to the ſword; the women and the children made ſlaves. Not but that Baſſus yet made good his articles, in diſmiſſing of the gariſon, and ſetting Eleazar free.

CHAP. XXVI.

Baſſus ſurprizes the Jews in the foreſt of Jardes, Three thouſand of them cut off. A poll-tax upon the Jews.

SO ſoon as this was over, Baſſus made all the haſte he could with his army to the foreſt of Jardes, upon intelligence, that great numbers of Jews, who had made their eſcape from the ſiege of Jeruſalem and Macherus, were gather'd together there; and when he came upon the place, he found it to be true: ſo that the firſt thing he did was to beſet the whole wood with his horſe; where he kept his guard ſo ſtrict, that not a Jew could break thorough. He employ'd his foot at the ſame time to cut down the trees and buſhes of the thickets where the Jews had taken ſanctuary; inſomuch, that they had now no poſſibility left them to ſave themſelves, unleſs they could cut out their way through the enemy's troops, and ſo get off. This being the laſt experiment they had to truſt to, they drew all into a body, and with an impetuous clamour, made one deſperate puſh upon thoſe that ſurrounded them, and were as bravely receiv'd. The engagement, in fine, betwixt the fearleſs temerity of the one ſide, and the firm courage of the other, was hot and obſtinate: but in the concluſion the Romans carried the day, with the loſs only of twelve kill'd, and not many wounded; whereas, of three thouſand Jews, (for there were ſo many in this action) not ſo much as one man came off. There was Judas alſo among the reſt, their leader, and the ſon of Jair, of whom we have ſpoken heretofore. He had formerly a command at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, and made his eſcape at laſt out of a vault.

Three thouſand Jews cut off.

THE emperor at the ſame time wrote to his officer Liberius Maximus, to make ſale of all the Jews lands; for he would not trouble himſelf with rebuilding any other cities, but take them all to his own uſe; leaving only eight hundred ſoldiers in Emmaus, ſome ſixty furlongs from Jeruſalem, and impoſing a tax upon every Jew by the poll, of two * drachmas a year, to be pay'd in to the capitol, as formerly to the temple. This was the miſerable ſtate of things at that time with the Jews.

furlongs from the city, and encamped upon a plain. Ceſennius, in the mean time, ſends ſoldiers to take poſſeſſion of Samoſata, and to keep gariſon there; while he himſelf, with other troops, marches away after Antiochus. But all this violence and injuſtice was not ſufficient yet to provoke the king to any unfriendly act againſt the Romans; or to do any thing more than to lament his hard fortune, and to bear all things with patience.

Antiochus reſolves to withdraw without any act of hoſtility.

Antiochus an unfortunate prince. Ceſennius repreſent him as an enemy to Ceſar

IT ſo fell out in the fourth year of Veſpaſian, that Antiochus the king of Comagene, with his whole family, fell into a moſt deplorable diſtreſs: and this was the occaſion of it. Ceſennius Petus, being governor of Syria, wrote Ceſar word, that Antiochus and his ſon Epiphanes were reſolved to revolt from the Romans; and that they had already treated about it with the king of Parthia: inſiſting alſo upon the neceſſity of preventing the miſchief by ſtriking the firſt blow. For it might be enough elſe to ſet the whole empire in a flame. Now whether this was truth, or malice, may be another queſtion: but whatever it was, Ceſar could not in prudence neglect the advice; either in reſpect of the neighbourhood of thoſe two kings, which made the caſe ſtill more dangerous, or in regard that Samoſata being the capital city of Comagene, and bordering upon the Euphrates, the Parthians might paſs and repaſs at pleaſure, and ſecure themſelves of a ſafe retreat at hand.

Ceſennius makes an incurſion into Comagene.

VESPASIAN was ſo poſſeſs'd with the credit of the ſtory, that he left Ceſennius to his own diſcretion, and with a commiſſion to do in it what he thought fit. Ceſennius loſt no time, in making the beſt of his deputation; for he fell immediately into Comagene, with the ſixth legion, and ſome battalions of foot, and ſquadrons of horſe, with Ariſtobulus the king of Chalcis, and Sohemus the king of Emeſa, to ſecond him; Antiochus and his ſubjects never ſo much as dreaming of the matter. His entrance was without any oppoſition at all; for the natives were not in a condition to encounter him: and then for Antiochus, the news of this incurſion was a moſt unaccountable ſurprize to him, who never had ſo much as the leaſt thought of a miſunderſtanding with the Romans. The reſolution he took in this difficulty, was to leave the kingdom juſt as it ſtood at that inſtant, and to take his wife and children along with him as an inſtance of his good faith to the empire, and likewiſe as a pregnant proof of his innocence. Hereupon he withdrew about an hundred and † thirty

His two ſons, Epiphanes and Callinicus gave the Romans battle.

BUT for his ſons, Epiphanes and Callinicus, who were youthful, martial, and brave, they could not in honour but betake themſelves to their arms: ſo that drawing out what ſtrength they were able to make, they gave the Romans battle; fought it out all day, and in the end ſhew'd a conduct anſwerable to their valour; for they came off with very little loſs.

Antiochus retires into Cilicia.

THE fortune of this day was favourable to Antiochus, but all too little to put a ſtop to the retreat he had reſolv'd upon; for he took his wife and daughters away with him into Cilicia: and this ſcrupulous integrity of his went ſo far, that it quite diſpirited his ſoldiers. For what could they hope for, they ſaid, when the king himſelf deſpair'd; deſerting their prince in that diſtraction, and going over to the Romans. All that Epiphanes and his brother had now to do, was to ſave themſelves before it was too late. And ſo with eight horſemen more, (ten in all) they paſs'd the Euphrates, (where they were now ſecure) in order to eſcape to Vologeſes the king of Parthia. This generous prince, upon their arrival, did not treat them like fugitives, but with that royal ſtate and reſpect that became their birth and quality.

And the brothers ſhift for themſelves.

Vologeſes receives them according to their birth and quality.

Ceſennius orders Antiochus to be ſent priſoner to Rome.

ANTIOCHUS being now come to Tarſus in Cilicia, Ceſennius ſent an officer to take him into cuſtody, and carry him bound to Rome. But Veſpaſian was too generous to treat a crown'd head at that rate, and choſe rather to ſhew a reſpect to the memory of an antient friendſhip, than to revenge himſelf for a ſuppoſed injury: wherefore he order'd his chains to be taken off upon the way, his journey to Rome reſpited, and himſelf to make ſome ſtay at Lacedemon; where Veſpaſian furniſh'd him with proviſions of money, ſuitable to the dignity of a royal expence.

Veſpaſian cauſes his chains to be taken off, and treats him with all manner of reſpect.

THIS honourable and generous way of proceeding toward Antiochus, did not only deliver the brothers from the dread and anxiety they lay under for fear of their father, but put them in hopes even of a reconciliation to Ceſar himſelf; eſpecially upon the interceſſion of Vologeſes, that they might be permitted to go to Rome by Ceſar's conſent: for though they liv'd in a condition ſuitable to their dignity, they had no patience yet to live out of the pale of the empire. This requeſt Ceſar graciouſly granted: upon which they came to Rome, whither their father was brought ſoon after, where they were all three entertain'd with high demonſtrations of affection and eſteem.

The father and the two ſons conducted to Rome, and highly entertain'd.

join'd in a confederacy with the king of Hyrcania, to break into Media, and lay the land waſte: this king being the maſter of the only paſſage into that country; which, they ſay, Alexander ſo order'd, as to have it ſhut up with iron gates. This paſs being now laid open, they poſſeſs'd themſelves of the place, without either ſuſpicion or reſiſtance, and carry'd off a booty, in goods and cattle, to a mighty value. This inroad put Pacorus (then king of the place) into ſuch a fright, that he left his eſtate at mercy, and flying for his own ſafety into crags and ſtrong holds, he made a ſhift at laſt to redeem his wife and concubines for an hundred * talents. At this rate they preſs'd forward, ſpoiling and making havock all the way they went, without the leaſt reſiſtance, up to the borders of Armenia; Tiridates being at that time king there. This Tiridates made head againſt them, and fought them, and was within a very little of being taken alive in the battle, by the nooſe of a halter that was thrown over his head in the action; but in the very moment while they were drawing him off, he cut the rope with his ſword, and got away. The ſucceſs of this combat made theſe Barbarians more bloody and inſolent than before, inſomuch that they depopulated all, wherever they came, and carry'd off vaſt numbers of men and cattle along with them to their own homes.

Eleazar the governor of Maſſada. The lewdeſt age ſince the creation. The Sicarii led the way; but John of Giſchala out-did them all. The brutal barbarities of Simon. The Idumeans inhuman and bloody. The Zelotes the wickedeſt and moſt wretched of mortals. A gariſon of the Sicarii in Maſſada. Silva beſieges it. The ſituation, deſcription, and ſtrength of it both by art and nature. Silva advances his batteries, and gains the rock Leuce; but his batteries failing, he ſets all in a flame. A diſcourſe upon the contempt of death, and the immortality of the ſoul. Reflections upon the Indian philoſophers and the Brachmans. Several inſtances of the ſufferings of the Jews. The queſtion of life and death debated. The Jews ſo poſſeſſed with it, that they reſolve not to outlive their laws and liberties: they agree upon a method for the executing of that reſolution. The Romans advance the next morning to the aſſault, and find only a pile of dead bodies to receive them.

BASSUS was now dead in Judea, and Flavius Silva conſtituted his ſucceſſor in the goverment; who, finding the whole country to be reduc'd, ſaving only one rebellious caſtle, drew out all the force he was able to make, with a reſolution to attack it. The caſtle's name was Maſſada, and one Eleazar commanded it, the ring-leader of the Sicarii, or cutthroats, who had got in poſſeſſion of it. This Eleazar was deſcended from one Judas, who, as we have ſaid already, was the man that moſt violently oppos'd the Jews entring their names upon the roll, when Cyrenius executed the office of Cenſor in Judea. This faction of the Sicarii were profeſs'd enemies to all that ſhew'd any manner of reſpect to the Romans: and they treated them alſo like enemies, even to the degree of pillaging their goods, driving away their cattle, and burning their houſes. "For what are theſe men better than ſtrangers, ſaid they, that betray the liberty of their country for want of fighting for it, and had rather live ſlaves than freemen; notwithſtanding that freedom is a bleſſing can never be bought too dear? Were it not better for ſuch men as theſe, they cry'd, to join barefac'd with the Romans?" but theſe were only words of courſe, for a pretext to their inhumanity and avarice, as moſt evidently appear'd in the concluſion. For when thoſe very men whom they branded with perfidy and cowardize came to join in the revolt, and in the common cauſe againſt the Romans, they were worſe us'd than before: eſpecially thoſe that laid open the hypocriſy of their pretenſions, and the iniquity of their practice.

The caſtle of Maſſada, and Eleazar the governor of it.

THERE was never ſuch an age certainly ſince the creation, for all manner of impiety, as this juncture among the Jews. They left no new wickedneſs to be either done or thought of, or for invention itſelf to work upon. Never ſuch an agreement publick and private, in all ſorts of corruptions: never ſuch emulation in all things that were ill, who ſhould outdo the other: men in power oppreſs'd the common people, and the common people were as ſevere again upon men in power; the one for dominion, the other for pillage. The lewdeſt age ſince the creation.

THE Sicarii were the firſt that led the way to this licentious courſe of blood and violence, without ſlipping any opportunity, either by word or deed, of doing miſchief where they were ſet upon it. But all this was not to compare with the extravagant cruelties of John: who did not only put particular men to death, as common enemies (citizens eſpecially) for preſuming to adviſe things neceſſary and profitable for the publick; but multiply'd all manner of outrages alſo upon his country. And who could expect better from a man that made no conſcience of affronting God himſelf? as in the uſe of forbidden meats, renouncing the purity of his profeſſion, and departing from the laws and cuſtoms of our forefathers. What wonder now, to ſee a man inhuman to his neighbour, that has no more reverence for his maker! The Sicarii led the way. But John of Giſchala out-did them all.

AND ſo for Simon the ſon of Gioras, what villany was not that man guilty of? what barbarities did he not inflict upon the very men that rais'd him? thoſe, that of freemen born, made themſelves his ſlaves! The natural ties of blood and friendſhip had no other effect upon this ſort of people, than to inflame them to the execution of more horrid butcheries. They look'd upon it as a mean, and a kind of ſcandalous inſolence to tyrannize over ſtrangers, compar'd with the more generous and heroical bravery of trampling upon their own fleſh and blood. The barbarous cruelties of Simon.

AND the Idumeans came not much behind them neither; thoſe bloody miſcreants, who The Idumeans inhuman and bloody.

* It is difficult to determine what talent is here meant: but admitting it to be the greater Attick talent, an hundred weighed ſeven thouſand ſix hundred four pounds and two ounces; and their value in ſilver amounted to twenty two thoaſund eight hundred twelve pounds and ten ſhillings, and in gold to three hundred ſixty five thouſand pounds, Engliſh money.

The Idumeans inhuman and bloody.

after the aſſaſſinating of the high-prieſts, to cut off, as much as in them lay, the whole frame and order of religion at a blow, confounded likewiſe the polity of the city, without leaving ſo much as the face of juſtice or civil government, and ſet up tyranny and oppreſſion in the ſtead of it. This was the province of thoſe they call Zelotes, and they had given themſelves a title to the name by their works; as the moſt paſſionate patrons and promoters of vice and lewdneſs upon the earth, though under the colour of piety and virtue; but ſeducing thoſe they would impoſe upon by fallacies and falſe lights, and at the ſame time turning evil into good, and good into evil.

The Zelotes the wickedeſt,

And the moſt miſerable of mortals.

THEY had at laſt, however, the end they deſerv'd, in the manifeſtation of God's juſt vengeance upon them: for they ſuffer'd all the calamities and torments that it is poſſible for fleſh and blood to undergo, and this throughout the whole courſe of their lives.

IT will be ſaid perhaps that the puniſhment fell ſhort of the offence. And it may be anſwer'd, that no puniſhment could come up to it. But this is not a time or place to enter upon the hiſtory of thoſe unhappy wretches that fell into the hands of theſe monſters: ſo that I ſhall rather return to my relation, and go on where I left.

A garriſon of the Sicarii in Maſſada, under Eleazar.

SILVA the Roman general was now upon his march to beſiege Maſſada, where there was a garriſon of the Sicarii under the command of Eleazar; who was the head of that party. He made ſure of the country about it, without much difficulty; ſettled his garriſons as he ſaw convenient, and ran up a wall about the caſtle to prevent excurſions or eſcapes, and to ſecure his guards. He made choice of a quarter for his camp, that he found moſt commodious for his purpoſe: that is to ſay, upon the joining of the caſtle-rock to the next mountain: only proviſions were extremely ſcarce; for they were brought a great way, and with much trouble to the Jews, whoſe buſineſs it was to ſupply them; beſide the bringing of water another way too, for there was no fountain near the place.

Silva beſieges it.

MATTERS being thus order'd, Silva diſpos'd himſelf to the ſiege, which was like to be a work of time and labour, as will appear by the ſituation of the caſtle. It ſtands upon a large high rock, with deep and craggy precipices round about it: and there is no diſcerning the bottom from above by reaſon of other rocks that interpoſe and cover it. The acceſs is ſo difficult, that even the beaſts themſelves cannot climb it, ſaving only by two paſſages: one to the eaſtward from the lake Aſphaltitis, which is very nice and dangerous; the other from the weſt, which is the more practicable of the two. They call one of them by the name of the Snake, from the ſeveral windings and turnings in the aſcent: for the rocks in many places double upon themſelves, and run in and out ſo, that people are fain to go backward and forward to paſs them. And the paſſages are ſo narrow likewiſe, that there's no walking upon them but by ſtanding upon one foot while you advance the other: beſide that one ſlip, or a falſe ſtep, is certain death; for it drops you into a precipice that gives a man a horror but to think of it. They reckon thirty * furlongs of this way from the bottom to the top of the mountain, which brings you into a plain, where Jonathan the high-prieſt erected a caſtle, and called it Maſſada; he himſelf being the firſt founder of it. Herod the Great ſpared afterwards for no coſt or care to adorn and fortify it. He carried a wall about it, of ſeven † furlongs in compaſs; all of curious white ſtone, twelve ‡ cubits high and eight over. He built likewiſe twenty ſeven turrets, each of fifty § cubits in height: and theſe towers entertain'd a communication with all the buildings on the inſide of the wall. The plain above was ſo well condition'd, and ſo fruitful a ſoil, that Herod order'd it to be ſet apart for tillage; to the end that whoever ſhould take ſanctuary in that caſtle, he might be ſure not to want neceſſaries. He cauſed alſo a royal and a ſtately palace to be built for himſelf within the compaſs of the caſtle: the entrance fronting weſtward, and bending a little to the north. The walls of it were very high and ſtrong, with four towers in the four corners, each of ſixty  cubits high. The apartments, galleries and baths, were for variety, ornament and contrivance, very rich and glorious: and all ſupported with pillars, each of one entire ſtone; and ſo maſterly put together, that nothing could be more ſubſtantial. The walls and the pavement were all checker'd with party-colour'd ſtone. To every quarter about this palace, the plain above, and before the turrets, there were a great many large ciſterns hew'd out of the rock for the preſerving of water; ſo that theſe veſſels abundantly ſupply'd the want of fountains. There was a way alſo cut under ground, from the palace up to the caſtle, which was not to be diſcover'd from without; and the other was effectually impaſſable, as we have ſaid already. But for the weſtern paſs, there was a tower ſet up in the narroweſt part of it, a matter of a thouſand †† cubits from the caſtle, that quite block'd it up. Not but that the attempt would have been difficult enough, even without any oppoſition: but this is to ſhew the ſtate and condition of the place, both by art and nature.

Now this caſtle was not only provided againſt force and ſtratagem, but againſt the very dint of famine too: for there was corn in it, wine, oil, all ſorts of pulſe, dates, &c. for many years; which was all found in it, when

* Thirty furlongs amounted to three Engliſh miles and three quarters, and forty five geometrical paces, as hath been ſeveral times before obſerved.

† Seven furlongs were ſeven eighths of a mile, that is one furlong and nine geometrical paces above three quarters of an Engliſh mile.

‡ Twelve cubits amounted to ſomething upwards of one and twenty Engliſh feet, that is ſeven yards; and eight cubits to ſomething more than fourteen Engliſh feet, that is four yards and two feet.

§ Fifty cubits amounted to ſomething more than ninety one Engliſh feet, that is thirty yards and one foot.

 Sixty cubits amounted to ſomething more than one hundred and nine feet, that is to thirty ſix yards and one foot.

†† A thouſand cubits amounted to ſomething upwards of eighteen hundred and twenty five feet, that is to ſix hundred and eight yards and one foot.

Eleazar

Eleazar with his Sicarii ſurpriz'd it: and it was all as freſh and ſound too, (though an hundred years depoſited) as if it had been but newly laid up. And perhaps the purity of the air at that height, abſtracted from groſs and ſeculent vapours, might be the reaſon of it.

THERE was alſo a magazine of all ſorts of arms for ten thouſand men, ſtor'd there by the king's order; a great quantity of unwrought iron, braſs, lead, and the like; which we may preſume was prepared for ſome great deſign.

Herod intended it for a retreat in caſe of need.

THERE goes a tradition, that Herod finding himſelf diſtreſs'd under two difficulties, provided this caſtle for his retreat in caſe of need: the one was for fear the people ſhould depoſe him, and ſet the Aſmonean family upon the throne again; the other was a matter of a more dangerous conſequence. Cleopatra the queen of Egypt had a deſign, it ſeems, upon the life of Herod: and ſhe made no ſecret of it neither; but own'd the thing, and had ſeveral diſcourſes with Antony about it; preſſing him that Herod might be diſpatch'd out of the way, and ſhe herſelf made queen of the Jews in his ſtead. It was a wonder that the paſſion Antony had for Cleopatra could deny her any thing; but Herod however, upon this apprehenſion, put Maſſada into ſuch a condition, that there was hardly any thought of taking it; and the Romans could never be abſolute maſters of the Jews without it.

Silva advances with his battery.

THE Jews being now ſo cloſe wall'd up in Maſſada, that there was no poſſibility, as I ſaid before, of their eſcaping, Silva advanced with his machines; there being but one place that he could fill up to raiſe a mount upon. For beyond that tower that blocks up the way upon the weſt, to the palace and caſtle, there was a large long rock call Leuce; larger than that the caſtle ſtood upon, but not ſo high by three * hundred cubits as Maſſada. The general had no ſooner gain'd this rock, but he ſet his ſoldiers at work to advance a mount upon it; and they wrought ſo hard, that they carried it up to the height of two † hundred cubits: which not being as yet ſtrong enough to ſupport the engines, they rais'd a kind of platform upon it, wrought with great ſtones, fifty † cubits high, and as much over. But beſide theſe ordinary machines, they had others alſo of the invention of Veſpaſian, but improved afterwards by Titus. They erected farther upon this platform, a tower of ſixty cubits, and fortify'd with iron.

He gains the rock Leuce.

THE Romans from this turret, gall'd the defendants with their ſtones and arrows to ſuch a degree, that they durſt not ſhew their heads upon the walls. Silva, in the mean time, kept battering the wall with a moſt prodigious ram; which by little and little made ſome ſmall impreſſion upon it. But the Sicarii quickly ſupply'd that defect by clapping up another wall behind it that feared no machines: for the matter of it being ſoft and yielding, it deaded the ſtroke: and the manner of the ſtructure was this. They took two rows of large timbers, and mortiſſed them one into another. They were both of a ſize, and together with a ſpace left betwixt them, juſt anſwered the thickneſs of the wall. This ſpace they filled with a kind of clayiſh earth, and nail'd up boards a-croſs the frame to keep the earth from falling down: ſo that it ſtood as firm as the wall of a houſe, and the more it was battered the ſtronger it was, as if it been ramm'd and conſolidated into a better ſtate of defence.

Silva's batteries being defeated, he tries fire, and ſets all in a flame.

WHEN Silva found his engines defeated, he reſolved to attempt that by fire, which he could not compaſs by battery; and ſo ordered his ſoldiers to try what might be done by brands-ends and fire-works, towards the deſtroying of their defences. Their new wall being moſt of it timber-work and hollow, took fire immediately, and burſt out into a mighty flame; which began with the wind on the north, and beat ſo terribly upon the Romans, that they almoſt deſpair'd of ſaving their machines. But the wind luckily chopping about all on a ſudden into the ſouth, drove ſo furiouſly upon the wall, that it ſet all in a flame from top to bottom. The Romans were ſo ſenſible of God's appearing in their favour upon this occaſion, that they return'd chearfully to their camp, with a full reſolution to make an attack upon the enemy the next morning by break of day; and to keep ſtrong watches in the mean while that they might not get off in the night.

BUT Eleazar had no thought of ſtarting himſelf, or of ſuffering any of his people ſo to do. The wall however being conſum'd to the ground, and no hope or poſſibility left of ſafety or relief, the only brave thing they had before them was to conſider how they might deliver their wives and children from the ignominious outrages they might expect from the Romans, whenever they came to be maſters of the place. Eleazar concluded, upon the ballancing of this queſtion, that a glorious death was infinitely to be prefer'd to a life of infamy; and that the moſt generous reſolution they could take in the world, would be not to out-live their liberties. This being his own opinion, he call'd together the moſt couragious of his friends and companions, and did what he could, by reaſon and exhortation, to diſcourſe them into the ſame mind.

Eleazar's diſcourſe upon the contempt of death.

" It is no new thing, ſays he, my generous " friends, for our people to diſclaim any o- " ther lord and maſter, than the true and ſo- " vereign lord and maſter of the univerſe, God " himſelf; and this without exception to the " Romans, or to any other nation whatſoever. " The time is now at hand to make good our " words by our deeds: wherefore let us act " like ourſelves now. We have hitherto run " all hazards to preſerve our freedoms; but " we are at preſent threaten'd with chains, " and the worſt of torments together, if we " fall alive into our enemies hands; as the " firſt that fell off from them, and the laſt that " ſtood out againſt them. The matter duly " conſider'd, we are to look upon it as a ſin- " gular grace and favour from above, to be " left ſtill at liberty to chuſe our death: a " bleſſing deny'd to many that are gone before " us. We are certain to be all ſlaves to-morrow,

" row, if we do not prevent it by ſetting our-" ſelves free this very night: and it is not in " the power of our enemies to hinder it. Nei" ther is there any thing they deſire more,
" than to take us alive; and it is now too
" late to think of prevailing againſt them by " force of arms. Something might have been " done at firſt perhaps, if the aſſertors of our " liberties had but duly conſider'd things.
" For they would have found that if God had " not caſt us off, though formerly his choſen
" people, he would never have expos'd us to
" what we have ſuffer'd, both by our own
" diviſions, and from our enemies, the de-
" ſtruction of ſo many of our principal men,
" and the holy city itſelf laid waſte with fire
" and ſword. But how comes it laſt that we " alone are the men of the whole nation to
" ſtand up for our liberties, as if we ourſelves
" were innocent of thoſe iniquities that we " have taught to others? You ſee by this time
" the vanity of your extravagant hopes, and the " miſery of your diſappointments. And what " are we the better here for an impregnable
" caſtle, with an ample proviſion of arms,
" and all neceſſaries for our ſupport, when
" God hath manifeſtly doom'd us to deſtru-
" ction? What do you think of that judicial
" wind and fire, that left the Romans to con-
" ſume us and our new wall? Did it do this
" of its own accord, do ye think? or was it
" not rather an infliction upon us for the cry-
" ing ſins we had been guilty of one towards
" another? Now ſince our puniſhment is juſt,
" and that there is no avoiding of it, will it
" not be much more reaſonable for us to do
" juſtice upon ourſelves, than to leave it to " the victorious Romans, as the executors of " divine vengeance? By this means, we ſecure
" the honour of our wives, and the freedom
" of our children? And next to them, let us
" honourably take our own turns, and die
" free; leaving that memorial behind us as
" the beſt of monuments. But in the firſt
" place, let the caſtle be ſet on fire, and our " own gold and ſilver melted down; for the " Romans will be ſick of their purchaſe, with" out the poſſeſſion, either of our treaſure, or
" of our perſons. Let the proviſions for the " mouth and belly be left behind, as a teſti-
" mony that we were not ſtarved into this " condition; but kept to our firſt reſolution
" of chuſing death rather than bondage."

A judicial wind and fire

This was Eleazar's ſpeech; but it did not reliſh with all alike: ſome were very much pleaſed with the propoſal, and as forward to put it in execution; reckoning upon death as a deſirable ſtate upon thoſe terms. Thoſe that were good-natured, or tender-hearted, had a horror upon them to think of taking away the lives of their friends, and no leſs at the thought of laying violent hands upon themſelves: and then looking mournfully one upon another with tears in their eyes, they betray'd the ſoftneſſes of their hearts. Eleazar was not a little troubled at theſe effeminate weakneſſes, for fear of ſtaggering others that ſeem'd well enough reſolved, and calling in queſtion the dignity of his propoſition. He follow'd his point however, and went on with his exhortation; but with another ſort of air and ſpirit, advancing his diſcourſe upon the ſubject of the immortality of the ſoul: and fixing his eye upon thoſe that he ſaw in tears, he addreſſed himſelf that way, in a vehement earneſtneſs of exclamation, and in theſe or the like words.

Of the immortality of the ſoul.

" I am, ſays he, wonderfully miſtaken, I " perceive, in my opinion, that brave men in
" a conteſt for liberty, had rather loſe their " lives than their cauſe. But it is otherwiſe
" with you, I find, that are afraid to die,
" though to deliver yourſelves from calami-
" ties worſe than death itſelf: and in a caſe
" too, that neither needs counſel, nor will " bear delay. We have it from antiquity,
" the holy ſcriptures, the laws and cuſtoms
" of our country, the doctrine and practice of " our fore-fathers: and it is generally allow'd
" that it is not life, but death, that makes a " man happy. For what is it but death that
" ſets the ſoul at liberty, and tranſmits it into
" thoſe pure and bleſſed regions where it ſhall
" never know corruption? But ſo long as it
" communicates with the mortal body, it par-
" takes alſo with the evils of that body; and
" it is in a manner dead; for what affinity is " there betwixt divine and mortal? Soul and " body in conjunction, 'tis true, may do
" much; for the body is but the ſoul's inſtru-
" ment, and their ſecret offices and operations
" are unaccountable. But when the ſoul comes
" once to be diſcharged of its clog and weight
" that keeps it down, and to recover its pro" per ſtation, it enjoys a vigorous and a per" fect liberty; not viſible to human eyes, but " inviſible, as God himſelf is; and it is in" viſible alſo in our bodies. It comes into us
" unſeen, and ſo it goes out again; incor-
" ruptible in itſelf, but cauſing variety of " changes in the body: for whatever the ſoul
" influences, it puts life and vigour into it:
" and when ever it withdraws itſelf, the ſepa-
" ration is certain death. But this does not " hinder the ſoul yet from being immortal.
" As in ſleep, for inſtance, how quietly does
" the ſoul repoſe itſelf in that reſpite from
" the diſtractions of the body! Which ſhews
" the happineſs of the ſoul is wrapt up with-
" in itſelf, and likewiſe that it holds ſome
" ſort of communication with the Almighty,
" in foretelling things to come. But how can
" any man pretend to fear death that loves
" reſt! Or who but a mad-man, for the ſake
" of a ſhort life, will debar himſelf of a life
" eternal? Beſide, that we are trained up
" by the laws and inſtitution of our profeſſi-
" on, not only to the contempt of death our-
" ſelves, but alſo to preach and practiſe it
", for an example to others.

Of the Indian philoſophers and Brachmans

" Or if there needed any recourſe to ſtran-
" gers, for argument or authority upon this
" ſubject, what ſhall we ſay to the Indian phi-
" loſophers and Brachmans? a wiſe and a vir-
" tuous ſort of people. They look upon life
" only as a neceſſary function of nature: an " office which they diſcharge eaſily enough,
" and not without ſome impatience to be quit of
" the trouble. And they are not weary of " life neither, upon the account of pain or in" convenience; but for the love of immortali-
" ty, and a bleſſed converſation that ſhall ne" ver have an end. Nay, they take ſolemn
" leave of their friends too, as if it were but " for a journey, and tell them when they are a
" going: neither does any body offer to hin-
" der them; but, on the contrary, wiſh them
" happy, and ſend formal meſſages by them to

" to their acquaintance, in a full and certain " confidence that they underſtand one ano- " ther. And ſo when they have received all " their orders and inſtructions, they commit " their bodies to the fire, as a preparatory " purification, and go off with acclamations, " and to the ſatisfaction of all the ſpectators. " For among them, friends follow one ano- " ther more chearfully to death, than they " would do to a long journey; joying thoſe " that are now entring into a ſtate of immor- " tality, and only lamenting the reſt that ſtay " behind. What a ſhame will it be for us " now to fall ſhort of the Indians, in a mat- " ter of this importance, and to bring a ſcan- " dal upon the excellent laws and religion of " our fore-fathers by an inglorious abjection " of mind! Or put the caſe now, that we had " been otherwiſe inſtructed, and brought up in " the contrary principles from our very cra- " dle; as if life were the ſovereign good of " mankind, and death the moſt diſmal of ca- " lamities: the very occaſion ſhould make us " reſolute methinks, in our caſe, ſince neceſ- " ſity and the will of God will have it ſo; " and we are now to be puniſh'd with the loſs " of life, for our former abuſes of it, by the " ordering of a divine providence. Neither " are we to aſcribe it to our own arms, or to " the generoſity of the Romans, that we were " not every man of us cut off in this war. " And it was not ſimply a conqueſt neither, " but the mediation of a more powerful cauſe, " that made it look like one however. What " had the Romans to do in that bloody maſ- " cre of the Jews at Ceſarea by the people of " the place, where man, woman and child, " were cut off upon the ſeventh day's feſtival, " without one word of a conſpiracy, or the " leaſt reſiſtance? whereas the Romans never " look'd upon the Jews as their enemies, but " only when they revolted. Now it will be " ſaid perhaps, that there was an old grudge " betwixt the Jews of Ceſarea and the citi- " zens, and that the latter took this opportu- " nity for a revenge. What ſhall we ſay then " of the Scythopolitans that join'd with the " Greeks againſt us, and not with our friends " againſt the Romans? and what did they get " at laſt for their good will, but the utter de- " ſtruction of themſelves and their families? " This was the thanks, in fine, that we had " for our aſſiſtance; they brought us into the " ſame extremity, out of which we reſcu'd " them.

Several inſtances of the ſufferings of the Jews.

" IT would be too tedious to run over par- " ticular inſtances; for you know very well " that there is not ſo much as one city in Sy- " ria that has treated us better, and that is not " incomparably worſe to us than the Romans. " What do you think of Damaſcus now, that " without any colour, or pretence of a diſguſt, " butcher'd ten thouſand Jews, with their " wives and children, in that ſingle city? " and then they reckon upon at leaſt ſixty " thouſand kill'd in Egypt. Now that's no " wonder, you'll ſay, in a ſtrange land, where " they had no ſeconds to ſtand by them. But " to come now to our own caſe at home, that " had the courage to aſſert our liberties againſt " the Romans in our own country, and want- " ed neither men nor arms, fearleſs ſpirits, " impregnable cities, ſtrong holds, or any o- " ther manner of proviſions that might encou- " rage or ſtrengthen a revolt, and entitle us " to a reaſonable hope of a victorious iſſue. " But how long did this laſt, and to what end " did this pompous preparation ſerve us, ſave " only to our greater confuſion? for all is loſt, " you ſee, and only to the honour of the ene- " my, without any advantage to ourſelves, " for, and by whom, theſe ſtores were provided.

The queſtion of life and death debated in favour of the latter as the more deſirable of the two.

" How happy are they now that fell with " their ſwords in their hands, contending for " their liberty, and in the ſame act preſerving " it, compar'd with the ſurviving remainder " of us that are reſerv'd in chains: ſome for " torture, ſome for the fire, others for ſpec- " tacles; ſome for combat, and others to be " torn to pieces with whips; ſome half eaten " by beaſts, and ſet aſide for a ſecond " meal! Who would not ſuffer a thouſand " deaths rather than lead ſuch a life? but the " moſt deplorable of all the reſt are thoſe that " are yet living, and calling upon death, and " yet have not the heart to give it themſelves.

" PRAY ſummon up your thoughts, and con- " ſider what is become of your glorious me- " tropolis; your mighty walls and fortifica- " tions; your impregnable towers and caſtles; " your vaſt treaſuries and magazines, though " too little for your ſtores; your prodigious " multitudes of men: and what's become of " your holy place too, known by the name of " God's houſe? Is it not all torn up by the " roots, and nothing to be ſeen of it but the " ruins, that ſerve only for a camp to the con- " queror; a few unfortunate old men mourn- " ing over the aſhes of the temple, and a pro- " viſion of unhappy women reſerv'd for the " criminal uſe and ſervice of the ſoldiers?

" CAN any thing that hath but the ſoul of a " man ever ſubmit to look another ſun in the " face again after this? nay, though he might " live without either fear or danger, can any " man, I ſay, be ſo unnatural to his country, " ſo mean and narrow-hearted, as not to be " griev'd that ever he liv'd to ſee this day? " and it would have been well, if we had " been all in our graves before ever we beheld " theſe ſacrilegious ruins, and this glorious pile " of Jeruſalem laid in rubbiſh. But ſo long as " we had hopes and courage, we flatter'd our- " ſelves with the poſſibility of a redemption. " Theſe hopes however being intirely fruſtra- " ted, and nothing now left us to truſt to, but " the conſideration of an inſuperable neceſſity, " we have nothing more to do than to take " pity of ourſelves, our wives, and our chil- " dren; and to make all the haſte we can to " do it, while we have the means in our own " hands. We are all born to die, the brave " and the coward alike, and all ſubjected to the " ſame fate. Now for matter of indignity " and ſlavery, the ſeeing of our wives diſho- " nour'd, and our children led in triumph; " theſe are not evils ariſing from the neceſſity " of our nature, but the reſults of cowardize, " when a man might have dy'd and would not. " But for us who had the hearts to abandon " the Romans, and fly in the face of our maſ- " ters; and afterwards to refuſe quarter and " pardon, when it was offer'd us, and not ſo " much as to accept of an indemnity, though " they themſelves begg'd it of us: can any " body think, I ſay, that if ever they take us " alive, they will not treat us with the great- " eſt indignities?

"No one that has any bowels of compaſ-
" ſion can, without the greateſt horror, think
" of the miſerable condition both of young " and old; betwixt the ſtrength of body on " the one hand, to lie languiſhing under a
" lingring torment; and the weakneſs of age
" on the other, that is not able to ſupport it.
" The husband muſt expect to ſee his wife diſ-
" honour'd before his face; and the father,
" to hear his children begging in chains for re" lief. But while we are free, and maſters of " our ſwords, let us make a glorious uſe of " them, and preſerve our liberties. Let us
" die freemen, with the comfort and compa" ny of our wives and children about us. It
" is but what they themſelves deſire, what
" our laws require at our hands, and what " providence itſelf hath made neceſſary for us.
" Only the Romans are againſt it, for fear we " ſhould die before we fall into their hands.
" Let us diſpatch then, for it will be to our " immortal honour to take the prize they long
" for out of their hands, in leaving them on" ly the poor ſatisfaction of dead bodies for
" their triumph."

The whole body is of the ſame opinion with Eleazar, and join in a reſolution not to outlive their laws and liberties.

ELEAZAR would have gone on, if the whole company had not broken in upon him in this very inſtant; violently preſſing him to go thro' with his work, and every man contending with a phantaſtical emulation who ſhould be foremoſt, as a mark of the braveſt and the wiſeſt man. Such was the paſſion theſe people had for the deſtruction of themſelves and their families. And, which was yet more wonderful, they did not one man of them ſhrink when they came to the execution; but kept up their dear and natural affection to the laſt, upon an opinion that they could not do their friends a better office. They took their leave of their wives and children in their arms, with a kiſs, and a ſtab; weeping over them at the ſame time, and no more concerned than if the work had been done by other people's hands. The neceſſity of the action, (as they underſtood it) was their comfort, and their excuſe; for conſidering what they ſhould have ſuffer'd otherwiſe by the Romans, they thought they could not do leſs toward their deliverance. In ſhort, there was not one man's heart fail'd him; but they kill'd their beloved friends and relations without diſtinction. This was a miſerable neceſſity, but they were driven upon it by a miſerable choice: for the deſtroying of their wives and children (as it appear'd to them) was the leaſt evil they had before them.

The execution and the method of it.

WHEN they had proceeded thus far, they found the grief for what they had done already intolerable, and being conſcious to themſelves, that they could not ſurvive thoſe they had kill'd, (though never ſo little) without a manifeſt injury to the dead, they immediately pil'd up all their goods together on a heap and burnt them; and then chuſing ten men, by lot, out of their number, to do execution upon all the reſt, they ranged themſelves as near as they could to the dead bodies of their friends; gave them a parting embrace, and chearfully preſented their throats to thoſe that were to do the inhuman office. So ſoon as the ten had with a mighty reſolution diſcharg'd their part, they caſt lots among themſelves which of the remaining ten ſhould diſpatch the other nine, with a condition that the ſurviving tenth man ſhould kill himſelf upon the bodies of the reſt: ſuch a confidence had theſe people one in another. The nine dy'd with the ſame conſtancy as the reſt. The laſt man overlooking the bodies, and finding that they were all ſtark dead, ſet fire to the palace, and with a prodigious violence threw himſelf upon the point of his ſword, and ſo periſh'd amongſt the reſt of his friends.

THE tragedy being now over, and upon a preſumption, that there was not ſo much as one Jew fallen into the hands of the Romans, it appear'd afterwards that there was one antient woman; and another, a kinſwoman of Eleazar's (a perſon of admirable qualities) with five young boys, that had conceal'd themſelves all this while in an aqueduct, and eſcap'd the maſſacre. The number of the ſlain was nine hundred and ſixty, reckoning women and children into the account. This action fell out upon the fifteenth of the month * Xanthicus.

The Romans advance next morning to the aſſault, and find only a pile of dead bodies to receive them.

THE Romans by break of day next morning, with their ladders and bridges, made ready for an aſſault; but no enemy appearing, nor any noiſe to be heard, but the crackling of flames, the Romans could not tell what to make of theſe circumſtances, and of ſo dead a ſilence: ſo that they preſently gave a yell, like a ſhout upon the playing of a battery, to try if they could be anſwer'd. The clamour alarm'd the women in their hiding-holes; ſo that they came out upon it, and told the Romans the truth of the whole ſtory; which was ſo incredible however, that they could not believe it: but betaking themſelves to the quenching of the fire, and ſo following their way up to the palace, they found ſuch a carnage of dead bodies, that without inſulting and rejoicing as enemies, they broke into admiration at the generous greatneſs of the Jews minds; the ſteddineſs of their counſels, and the obſtinate agreement of ſuch a number of men in the contempt of death.

The turbulent and ſeditious humour of the Sicarii. The Jews impute all their misfortunes to that ſort of people. They will rather ſuffer death than own Ceſar for their maſter.

AFTER the taking of Maſſada, Silva the Roman general ſettled a gariſon there, and ſo march'd away with his army to Ceſarea, leaving the country in perfect peace and quiet behind him. Now the Jews of Judea were ſo abſolutely broken and ſubdu'd by the burden and continuance of the war, that there was not an enemy to be heard of in all that quarter; but there were thoſe alſo that felt of it as far as Alexandria in Egypt, where ſeveral of them were put to death. But a word or two upon this occaſion will not be amiſs.

liberty. "They look'd upon the Romans, "they ſaid, to be no better than themſelves, "and no other lord would they own, than "the lord of heaven and earth." And ſtill as they met with any contradiction, though from the beſt of their own profeſſion, it was as much as their lives were worth. Some they murder'd, others they debauch'd from their allegiance, or at leaſt endeavour'd to do it; and in fine, theſe practices of theirs became ſo bold and dangerous, that the leading men amongſt them did not think it ſafe to call them to any publick account. But the courſe they took, was to ſummon a general meeting of the Jews, and there to arraign the folly and temerity of the Sicarii, and to expoſe them to the people as the root and cauſe of all their misfortunes. "Now what would be the end on't, ſaid they, "if we ſhould force them to fly for their ſe- "curity? They'd be never the better for it, "and we the worſe. For ſo ſoon as ever the "Romans ſhall be well inform'd of the de- "ſign, their way will be to fall upon all pro- "miſcuouſly, and ſo deſtroy the innocent "with the guilty." Wherefore they cautioned the Jews not to involve themſelves with the Sicarii, but rather to provide for their own ſafety, by delivering up thoſe cut-throats to the Romans.

Violent and impatient of contradiction

The Jews arraign them in a publick aſſembly, as the authors of all their misfortunes.

THIS gave them ſuch a proſpect of the hazard they were in, that they fell violently upon the Sicarii, and took ſix hundred of them immediately. The reſt fled to Egypt, Thebes, and thereabouts; where they were retaken ſoon after, and brought back again, behaving themſelves to admiration, for the inſuperable hardineſs of their reſolution. What a variety of exquiſite torments did they endure, rather than acknowledge Ceſar for their maſter; and not one ſoul that would ſo much as deliberate upon the doing of it. But they ſtood all as firm, as if their ſouls had not been concerned in what their bodies endured. And the tranſcendent miracle of all is yet behind; which is, that the boys and the children ſtood the ſame ſhock with the reſt; and when they had ſuffer'd all that malice or invention could inflict upon them, not ſo much as one ſoul of them would own Ceſar to ſave his life; ſo much was their contempt of torments above the ſenſe of them.

Not a man of them would own Ceſar for his maſter, to ſave his life.

CHAP. XXX.

Onias moves Ptolemy to give the Jews leave to build a temple, and to enjoy the exerciſe of their worſhip. Ptolemy gives leave accordingly, and aſſigns them a ſpot of ground for it. This temple was erected, and afterwards ſhut up.

LUPUS being at that time governour of Alexandria, gave Ceſar early advice of this commotion, who was ſo well acquainted with the turbulent humour of the Jews, that he thought he could not be too cautious of their meetings and cabals, for fear of making factions and parties; and therefore ordered Lupus to demoliſh the Jews temple in the city Onion in Egypt; of which temple I ſhall ſay ſomething, both as to the name, and the founder.

ONIAS the ſon of Simon, one of the high-prieſts, being driven out of Jeruſalem in the time of the war betwixt Antiochus the king of Syria, and the Jews, withdrew to Alexandria, where he was very kindly receiv'd by Ptolemy the king of Egypt; partly, as an enemy to Antiochus, and partly upon a condition agreed upon betwixt them; which was this. Onias undertook to bring the Jews over into Ptolemy's intereſt, if he would but grant him one requeſt. The king promis'd him that he would, if it lay in his power; and ſo the other begg'd his leave only for the Jews to erect a temple ſome where or other in Egypt, where they might meet and worſhip God according to the laws and religion of their country. By this means, ſays he, Antiochus will become ſtill more and more odious to the Jews, and the Jews better affected to your ſervice; beſide the vaſt multitudes that will put themſelves under your protection for the free exerciſe of their worſhip.

Onias moves Ptolemy to give the Jews leave to build a temple, and enjoy the exerciſe of their worſhip.

PTOLEMY was well enough pleas'd with the propoſal, and ſo aſſign'd the Jews a ſpot of ground for their purpoſe, a matter of nineſcore * furlongs from Memphis, in the tract of Heliopolis: Onias built a caſtle there, and after that a temple, though not comparable, 'tis true, to that at Jeruſalem; but it had juſt ſuch another tower, made of vaſt ſtones, and ſixty † cubits in height. There was an altar alſo, after the model of Jeruſalem, and ſet out with donatives and preſents, much like the other, ſaving only that there was no candleſtick, but a golden lamp as bright as the ſun, inſtead of it, which hung upon a gold chain before the altar. This temple was encompaſs'd with a brick wall, the gates of ſtone, and it was likewiſe endow'd with a conſiderable revenue, both in land and money, that there might be nothing wanting to the ſolemnity and celebration of the ſervice. Now Onias did not do all this, as we ſay, for God's ſake, and out of the pure ſimplicity of his heart, but out of a ſpleen he bore to the Jeruſalem Jews that forced him away: and he propounded to himſelf by the erecting of this temple, to draw the Jews back to him again, that had forſaken him; eſpecially reflecting upon an old prophecy of nine hundred and ſeventy years ſtanding, which ſeems to look that way; beſide another prediction of the prophet Iſaiah, of a temple in time to come to be erected in Egypt, by a Jew.

Ptolemy grants the requeſt, and aſſigns a ſpot of ground for it.

THIS temple was built accordingly, and Lupus, in purſuance of the emperor's orders, went directly thither, carried off with him ſeveral preſents and oblations that he found there, and ſo ſhut it up. But Paulinus, who ſucceeded to the government after the death of Lupus, not only intirely ſtript the temple of all the donatives and preſents he found there, but threaten'd the prieſts ſeverely too in caſe of any concealment: nor would he receive any man whatſoever into the temple upon the account of religion, but ſhut the doors againſt them, without leaving ſo much as the leaſt appearance of divine worſhip there.

The temple was erected, and after that rifled and ſhut up.

Jonathan, an enthuſiaſt weaver, draws a party after him. They are taken and brought priſoners to Catullus, only Jonathan ſhifts out of the way: but being afterwards taken he comes to a better underſtanding with Catullus. His maſter-piece was ſubornation and corruption. Three thouſand Jews put to death at a time. Jonathan ſets up for a falſe witneſs. Joſeph the author of this hiſtory is made a priſoner. Veſpaſian pronounces Joſeph innocent, and ſentences Jonathan to be whipt and burnt alive. Catullus ends his days in torments of body and mind not to be expreſſed.

The inſolence of the Sicarri. Jonathan a weaver and enthuſiaſt, puts himſelf in the head of a faction.

THE audacious inſolence of the Sicarii ſpread like a contagion every where about Cyrene. As for example: there was one Jonathan, a weaver, that made his eſcape thither. He was a kind of an enthuſiaſt, and a wicked man, that drew vaſt numbers of ſimple people after him into woods and deſarts, under a pretext of ſhewing them prodigies and viſions: and the impoſture paſs'd for current with the common ſort. But the ſtory coming to the ears of ſome eminent Jews at Cyrene, they preſently traced it out, and gave timely notice of it to Catullus the governor of the Pentapolitan Libya, how the buſineſs ſtood, and which way they march'd. The governor way-laid them with horſe and foot, and eaſily maſter'd them, for they were but ſo many unarm'd man: a great party of them were kill'd, and the reſt taken alive, and carried priſons to Catullus.

The whole party is routed, and ſent priſoners to Catullus: only Jonathan makes his eſcape, but being taken at laſt and carried to Catullus, he found a way to divert the ſtorm from himſelf.

JONATHAN the ring-leader of this wretched multitude made his eſcape; but after a long and a ſtrict ſearch, he was at laſt found out and taken, and ſo carry'd to Catullus; where he found out a way to divert the ſtorm from himſelf, and to furniſh the governor with an acceptable occaſion of turning it another way: which was, by bringing the wealthieſt Jews of the place into the plot, as the heads and promoters of the conſpiracy. Theſe accuſations, how falſe ſoever, were welcome to Catullus; who fell preſently to deſcant and amplify upon things with ſuch aggravations, that a war againſt the Jews was as good as declar'd already. And to make the villany yet more execrable, he had not only the faculty of believing againſt truth and reaſon; but inſtructed the very Sicarii themſelves in the art of calumny: inſomuch, that he expreſly directed the falſe witneſſes to accuſe one Alexander a Jew, by name, to whom he had a long time declar'd himſelf a profeſs'd enemy; and his wife Berenice was alſo enſnar'd upon the ſame evidence. Theſe were the firſt that ſuffer'd, and after them, a train of three thouſand more were put to death at once; whoſe only crime was, they they were men of wealth and credit. And this, he thought, he might do with the more ſafety, ſince their eſtates thereby became confiſcate to the empire.

His maſterpiece was ſubornation and corruption.

Three thouſand Jews put to death at a time, purely upon the ſcore of their wealth and credit.

AND then for fear of being detected by Jews of credit elſewhere, he carry'd the impoſture further yet, and dealt with Jonathan and ſome other priſoners, to lay a ſnare for ſome of the moſt eminent men they had, for honour and integrity, in Rome and Alexandria, and to exhibit new matter againſt them. Joſeph himſelf, the author of this hiſtory, was one of the number. Now Catullus coming to Rome, and bringing Jonathan and the reſt of the priſoners in chains along with him, he made no doubt but the ſcrutiny was all over, and the fact given for granted, as he had repreſented and concerted it. But the event of this contrivance did not anſwer his expectation; for Veſpaſian being a little ſuſpicious upon the main, reſolved upon a thorough examination of the matter; and finding upon ſtrict ſcrutiny the iniquity of the proceeding, he pronounced, at the inſtance of Titus, Joſeph and his companions innocent, and thereupon they were diſcharg'd: but at the ſame time, he ſentenced Jonathan to be whipt, and burnt alive; which was accordingly executed.

Jonathan ſets up for a falſe witneſs.

Joſeph the author of this hiſtory is a priſoner.

Veſpaſian ſuſpects foul-dealing, and upon examination pronounces Joſeph innocent; and ſentences Jonathan to be whipt, and burnt alive.

As for Catullus, ſuch was the lenity of the two princes, that they proceeded no further againſt him at preſent: but, in a ſhort time after this, he was ſeiz'd with an incurable complication of diſeaſes; horrid gripes, and pains all over his body; and the anguiſh of his mind yet more inſupportable; torments of conſcience; ghaſtly apparitions and outcries, upon his being haunted with the ghoſts of thoſe he had murder'd; ſtarting out of his bed, and roaring out, as if he were upon the torture, or in the flames. His affliction, in fine, encreas'd upon him, till his guts putrify'd, rotted, and came out: this was his end, being effectually no other than a divine vengeance upon a wicked man.

Catullus ended his days in tortures of body and mind, not to be expreſs'd.

WE are now come to the end of our hiſtory; wherein we have proceeded with all faith and candour, according to our promiſe, for the ſatisfaction of thoſe that deſire to be truly inform'd in the particulars of the war betwixt the Romans and the Jews. How I have acquitted myſelf in the manner of writing this relation, let the reader judge: but as to the ſincerity of it upon the whole, I do here declare to the world, that I have kept myſelf ſtrictly to the truth of things from one end of the book to the other.

Concerning the

GOVERNING POWER of REASON.

By FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

CHAP. I.

MY deſign in this diſcourſe being to ſhew, that reaſon is the perfection of wiſdom) as will appear, if it can be made out, that this, duly improv'd by ſtudy and religion, is maſter of the paſſions) it is very fit I exhort my readers, to apply themſelves to the attaining of wiſdom with all poſſible attention. For reaſon is a neceſſary preliminary to knowledge, and in giving the commendation of excelling in this, we evidently imply the character of excelling in the nobleſt and moſt comprehenſive of all virtues, which is that of prudence. The caſe will be the ſame with regard to the reſt, if reaſon may be ſhewn effectually to reſtrain and maſter thoſe vile affections of gluttony and exceſs, laſciviouſneſs and ſenſual appetite, which obſtruct and are oppoſite to temperance: and ſo again, to correct that malignity of nature, and all thoſe corrupt inclinations, which hinder the practice and love of juſtice: and after the ſame manner, laſtly, to ſubdue the paſſions of anger, fear, and grief, and whatever elſe emaſculates the mind, or is contrary to that generous and ſteddy temper of ſoul, which makes the fourth cardinal virtue, and is known by the name of Fortitude.

To all this it may perhaps be objected, that they who aſcribe to reaſon the dominion I am contending for, are eaſily confuted from common experience. For, were it thus ſuperior to the paſſions, it would have the ſame controuling ſovereignty over ignorance and forgetfulneſs; which yet it manifeſtly hath not. But this, I muſt needs ſay, is a ridiculous objection, and miſtakes the ſtate of the queſtion. For when we affirm reaſon to be maſter of the paſſions, we mean, ſuch defects of nature only as are oppoſite to juſtice, temperance, and fortitude; all which are of a diſtinct kind, and belong to the ſenſitive ſoul; but not ſuch as are defects peculiar to itſelf, and ſtick to the rational ſoul. Again, the nature of this ſovereignty is quite miſtaken by the objector; for by it we do not mean, that reaſon takes thoſe affections it governs clean away (as it muſt do, if ignorance and forgetfulneſs were the objects of its power) but only that it does not tamely yield to, nor ſuffer itſelf to be vanquiſh'd by them.

Now that it is in the power of reaſon to command and ſubdue the paſſions, I could by great variety of arguments demonſtrate; but ſhall at preſent chuſe to confine myſelf to that moſt popular and undeniable one, matter of fact: the examples, I would ſay, of perſons who have ſignaliz'd themſelves by couragiouſly aſſerting, and dying in defence of truth and virtue; among which, none I think are more conſpicuous, none more deſervedly admir'd, than thoſe of our own country, Eleazar, and the ſeven brethren martyr'd with their mother. For all theſe deſpiſing the moſt exquiſite pains and tortures, and perſevering even unto death, have put it paſt a doubt, how abſolute a command reaſon hath over the paſſions. So that my preſent buſineſs ſhall be, to give theſe brave men, and that incomparable woman, the praiſes due to their immoveable conſtancy, and to congratulate the honours, which all ſucceeding ages muſt acknowledge to belong to their ſtedfaſt adherence to virtue and their duty. Theſe men, indeed, excited the admiration not only of all others that were indifferent and unbiaſs'd ſpectators, hearers, or readers of their ſufferings, but even of thoſe very enemies and moſt prejudic'd tormentors, who ſtood aſtoniſh'd at that courage and patience, which their own implacable malice exercis'd after ſo inhuman and barbarous a manner. They thus became the occaſions of releaſing their nation from oppreſſion, conquering the rage of a tyrant by their ſufferings, and becoming a ſacrifice of expiation for their country.

THE method, then, which I intend to take, ſhall be, firſt, to ſay ſomething in general concerning the point in debate, and then ſpeak to this inſtance in particular; giving as is fit due glory to that all-wiſe God, who hath been pleaſed to leave us ſo pregnant and uncontroulable an evidence of this truth, in the perſons whoſe virtues I am now about to celebrate.

THE queſtion to be reſolved is plainly this: Whether reaſon can controul and govern the paſſions? and in order to this reſolution, 'tis fit we explain what we mean by reaſon, what by paſſion, how many diſtinct ſpecies of paſſions there be, and whether this dominion of reaſon, which we aſſert, extend to all, or but ſome ſorts of paſſions. By reaſon then, I mean the intellectual faculty, improved and rightly guided by conſideration, and making a life of wiſdom its choice and chief concern. By wiſdom again I underſtand the knowledge of divine and human affairs, and the true cauſes and grounds of each; ſuch as we attain to by the diſcipline and inſtruction of the law: which teacheth us to embrace thoſe truths which relate to God with reverence, and thoſe regarding man, as things directed to, and uſeful for, the benefit of the world. Wiſdom again is commonly branched into, and allowed to conſiſt of, four principal virtues; to wit, prudence, juſtice, fortitude, and temperance. The nobleſt and moſt comprehenſive of theſe is prudence; and to this it is chiefly, that reaſon is beholden for the dominion it attains to over the paſſions.

THOSE paſſions again may be reduced to two ſo general heads, as ſhall include them all. Pleaſure, I mean, and pain: each of which acts upon the ſoul as its proper object. And each again hath ſeveral other affections coupled as it were in pairs to attend it, and diverſified by time and other circumſtances from its maſter-paſſion. Thus in the caſe of pleaſure, that which goes before it, is deſire; that which follows after after it, is joy: and ſo for pain too, fear goes before, and ſorrow comes behind it. But anger, I think, will not fall under any ſuch diſtinction, being rather a mixt paſſion, adminiſtring ſomewhat of pleaſure and pain both, to them who are ſenſible when it comes upon them, and nicely obſerve how they are affected with it. Under the head of pleaſure, again, there appears to be included a moſt vile and fruitful malignity, the moſt various and complicated of any paſſion whatſoever; ſo ſcandalous is its product, ſo manifold its forms: The mind is chiefly vitiated by it, when it appears in arrogance and avarice, envy and contention: and the body more immediately concerned, when it breaks out in gluttony and ſordidneſs; for pleaſure and pain grow out of the ſoul and body, like branches out of a common ſtock; and each of theſe branches have abundance of other ſubordinate affections, which ſprout out of them like little ſhoots and ſuckers. Now all theſe is the proper province of reaſon, like a skilful vine-dreſſer, to prune and purge, to correct and manage, and by all poſſible ways to tranſplant and ennoble, by ſweetning all the wild and ſour kinds, and ſo cultivating and improving that ſubject matter of paſſions and habits, that even that which is by nature refuſe and vicious, may by art and management be made generous and good. For reaſon leads us on to, and advances virtue, by reſtraining and overpowering the vehemence of thoſe paſſions which carry us away into vice. And that this is not affirmed without ground, convince yourſelf what a mighty effect it hath in matters where the virtue of temperance is obſtructed. Now temperance is nothing elſe, but the maſtery obtained over a man's deſires: and this is attained by reaſon. Of theſe deſires ſome are more peculiarly concern'd with the ſoul, and others with the body; and of both theſe ſorts reaſon ſeems to have the command; for I cannot but conclude, that when our appetites ſtand very ſtrongly to ſuch fiſh, and fowl, and other delicious food, as are forbidden by our law, and we, notwithſtanding ſuch inclinations, do abſtain from them upon that very account, that we ought not to indulge the uſe of them, this is a very plain inſtance how high a hand reaſon carries over theſe paſſions, which thus does in the temperate man, not only ſuſpend, but wholly tame and turn into another courſe, the moſt eager deſires of the lower of theſe diviſions, and perfectly tie up all the motions of the body, that it ſhall not make any ſtrong effort or ſtruggle, in oppoſition to the word of command given by this governor above.

CHAP. II.

BUT this perhaps will not deſerve to be thought any great matter, in compariſon of thoſe moſt furious deſires of the ſoul which luſt and beauty kindle; and yet Joſeph hath got himſelf immortal renown for abſolutely quelling theſe, even when invited to gratify them, and urged by all the fire of youth to comply with ſuch invitation. Nor is even this allaying the fury of vehement purſuits after pleaſure, and abſtaining from the impure act, the uttermoſt which reaſon may or ought to do; for it is plain our very inclinations are under its juriſdiction. Otherwiſe the law would have been moſt abſurd in laying upon us a command ſo impracticable as that, "Thou "ſhalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, or "any thing that is thy neighbour's." Gen. xxxix. 12. Exod. xx. 17.

Now it is plain, that when the law forbids us ſo much as to deſire at all, it much more ſtrongly implies, that reaſon is able to curb and conquer our deſires. And thus it is, not only in thoſe things which are oppoſite to the virtue of temperance, but that of juſtice alſo. For otherwiſe, what remedy could there be for reforming the gluttonous and greedy, the niggardly and ſordid man? but now, as ſoon as any man orders his converſation, according to the precepts of our law, though he be of never ſo covetous a diſpoſition, yet does he find himſelf obliged to lend to the poor without taking uſury for his money, and to remit the debt at the year of Jubilee; and though he be never ſo frugal, yet is he conſtrained by this law, neither to gather in the fruits of his field or vineyard in the ſabbatick year.

See Exod. xxii. 25. Lev. xxv.

SEVERAL other inſtances I could likewiſe produce, whereby it will appear, that reaſon governs our paſſions. For the law does in ſome caſes exerciſe dominion over the natural affection to our parents, forbidding us for their ſakes to betray the cauſe of truth and virtue; ſo does it over the tenderneſs to our wives, commanding us to puniſh them for the tranſgreſſion of their duty; ſo again over the love to our children, by ordering us to make them examples when they do amiſs; ſo laſtly over the kindneſs to our friends, by directing us to reprove their vices. And to confirm this truth yet more, and ſhew it practicable, reaſon, when acting by the law, does overcome our hatred to our enemies too; for it prohibits the cutting down their fruit-trees; it orders us to reſtore to our enemies the things which they have loſt, and to help their cattle when fallen and in diſtreſs.

Deut. xx. 19. Exod. xxiii. 4, 5. Lev. xix. 17.

FURTHER yet, reaſon, it is evident, bears ſway over even the moſt violent paſſions, ſuch as ambition, vain-glory, and envy: for all theſe evil diſpoſitions the ſober and conſiderate mind ſubdues and drives away, as it does anger alſo, which, though the moſt ungovernable of all paſſions, is yet ſubject to reaſon. Were it not ſo, how could our wiſe anceſtor Jacob ſo ſeverely condemn that fact of his ſons, Simeon and Levi, when they, contrary to reaſon, did utterly deſtroy the whole race of the Sichemites? ſaying in abhorrence of their intemperate rage, "Curſed be their anger for it "was fierce, and their wrath for it was cru-"el;" which words are plainly the voice of reaſon getting the better of reſentment.

Gen. xxxiv. 30. xlix 7.

IN a word, when God created man, and endued him with a power of conſideration, and free choice, he did at the ſame time implant in his nature variety of paſſions and diſpoſitions, and ſet his intellectual mind in the throne, to exerciſe government over all the ſenſual appetites within. Which being done, he gave this law, as a rule whereby the man might exerciſe that government, and lead a life of temperance, juſtice, and goodneſs. What ground then can there be for that objection, which makes a doubt whether reaſon can maſter the paſſions, becauſe it does not appear, that it attains to an abſolute maſtery over forgetfulneſs and ignorance?

CHAP. III.

THIS, as I ſaid, is a very ridiculous exception; for reaſon does not appear to have an abſolute power over ſuch defects as belong to the intellectual ſoul; but ſuch as are ſenſitive and bodily. Nor is its power over theſe pretended to be ſuch, as ſhould extirpate and quite take away our deſires; but only ſuch as preſerves men from being enſlaved to their deſires. No man can utterly diveſt himſelf of the paſſion of anger; but he may by reaſon find remedies againſt it, and prevent his being borne down by the violence of it.

WE are not to expect that reaſon ſhould ſet us clear from all evil diſpoſitions; but it will ſuccour us in our conflicts with, and enable us to ſtand our ground againſt, ſuch diſpoſitions: for the proper office of reaſon is not to change, but to aſſiſt nature; not to be a deſtroyer but an auxiliary.

THIS matter may receive ſome illuſtration from the example of David. We read, that he, after having engaged a whole day with an army of Philiſtines, and made a great ſlaughter of them, did in the evening retire into the royal tent, fatigued and ſpent, where all his officers and chieftains were encamped round about him. The reſt of the company refreſhed themſelves contentedly; but the king, being exceeding thirſty, could not ſatisfy his appetite with any water drawn out of thoſe ſprings of which they had plenty at hand, but an inconſiderate deſire ſeized him to drink of the water fetched from the enemies gariſon. Hereupon ſome of the king's mighty men, being deeply concerned to ſatisfy the king's longing, armed themſelves, took a pitcher, broke thro' the enemies trenches, paſs'd their guards, ſought out the well of Bethlehem, and brought from thence to the king the water which he ſo vehemently long'd for. But he, though parched with thirſt and eager deſire, recollected how dangerous and ſinful a thing it would be, to gratify his appetite at the hazard of his ſervants lives; and thought the drinking that water would be in effect to drink their blood: and therefore, oppoſing his reaſon to his inclination, he poured it out ſolemnly to the Lord. Thus a mind ſtrictly temperate and wiſe, is able to overcome the ſtrongeſt paſſions, to quench the burnings of the moſt furious deſires, to contend with the moſt exquiſite bodily pains, and vanquiſh all the force of paſſion, by a ſteddy principle of virtue and goodneſs. And now I think it ſeaſonable to confirm this argument by demonſtrative proofs of this power of reaſon exemplified by practice; of which our fathers have given undeniable inſtances: for, after that by their ſtrict obſervance of the law, and ſingular good lives, they had won upon the hearts of foreign princes, and prevailed upon Seleucus Nicanor the king of Aſia, ſo far, that he ſet apart a portion of his publick revenues to defray the expence of the ſacrifices, and did highly approve their conſtitution, it happened, that, after this profound tranquility, ſome of them were brought under various and ſevere trials, by the ill offices of wicked men, who diſturbed the publick peace in ſuch manner as the following chapter ſhall relate.

2. Sam. xxiii. 15—18.

CHAP. IV.

ONE Simon, who had a pique at Onias, who was then inveſted with the office of high prieſt, and ſo conſtituted for life, after having tried in vain, and to the great prejudice of our nation, to blacken this excellently good man with all manner of calumnies, finding himſelf not able to leſſen him in the affections and eſteem of his own people, fled to a foreign court, with wicked intent to betray his country. This wicked wretch applying himself to Appollonius, who was then governor of Syria and Phenicia, told him, that out of his great zeal for the king his master, he was come to make a discovery to him, which might be of considerable advantage to his majesty's affairs. It was, that in the treasury at Jerusalem there lay concealed immense sums of money, not appropriated to the temple, or employed to any publick use, but wealth hoarded up by private men, and so of right belonging to Seleucus. Apollonius, having received this account, commended Simon's zeal for the king's service, waited upon Seleucus, and imparted to him the secret. Upon this information he soon obtained a commission from the king, and straight marched into our country, bringing along with him the cursed traytor Simon, and a very powerful army.

The cause of this expedition he declared to be, that he might execute * the king's command, who had ordered him to seize upon all the money reserved in the publick treasury for the use of private men. The nation taking an alarm, and complaining of it, as a horrible injustice, to take away the treasure which the owners had for greater security deposited in the temple, did all they could to divert him from his purpose. But Apollonius with menaces and force made up to the temple. There might you see a multitude of priests, women, and children, all prostrating themselves before the holy place, earnestly begging God that he would defend his own temple from profanation and contempt.

But Apollonius still persisting, and entring the place with a body of armed men, as he was about to seize upon the treasury, behold angels from heaven suddenly appeared, mounted on horses, clad in shining armour, and struck the men immediately with fear and trembling. As for Apollonius himself, he fell down to the ground in the court of the Gentiles, half dead, stretching out his hands to heaven, and supplicating the Hebrews with many tears, that they would pray for him, that he might not be destroyed by that host from heaven. The high-priest Onias, moved with compassion, and fearing besides lest Seleucus the king should impute the death of Apollonius to the treachery and contrivance of men, granted his request, and prayed to God for him. So this man, being miraculously saved, returned back to the king, and made a faithful relation of all that had befallen him.

But after the death of Seleucus the king, his son † Antiochus, a man of a proud spirit and savage disposition, succeeded in the throne. This man, having deprived Onias of the priesthood, put into that office his brother Jason, upon consideration of a yearly tribute of three ‡ thousand six hundred and sixty talents, which he had covenanted to pay him; therefore the king constituted him superintendant, not in ecclesiasticals only as high-priest, but in civil affairs also. He then began to put our nation under severe trials, and, by introducing of new customs contrary to the law, seduced them to foreign usages and all manner of wickedness. He did not only institute Grecian games in the metropolis of our nation, but drew off the priests from the service of the temple. With which impiety the justice of God being provoked, stirred up Antiochus to make war upon them. For, while he was engaged in an expedition against Ptolemy king of Egypt, being informed, that some of the inhabitants of Jerusalem had expressed great joy at a report of his being dead, he presently turned his forces that way, and made miserable havock of them; publishing withal a decree, that all they should be put to death, who persevered in the customs of their own country, and lived according to the law of Moses; and finding, that this decree had not its intended effect, but that all his severest threatenings and punishments were so far despised, as that even the women, who continued to circumcise their children, were cast down headlong from the walls of the city, and still persisted in so doing, notwithstanding they knew what would follow; perceiving, I say, how little regard the people paid to his impious decrees, he came in person, and by torments compelled those that were brought before him, to eat of meats forbidden and unclean by the law, and so solemnly to abjure the Jewish religion in his presence.

CHAP. V.

It happened about this time, that Antiochus the tyrant, seating himself upon an eminent place, and surrounded with his counsellors and rulers, and a strong body of armed men, commanded many of the Hebrews to be brought by force before him, and there to be compelled to eat of swine's flesh, and meats offered to idols: which if any refused to pollute themselves with, they were immediately put to the torture and slain before him. When many had been thus barbarously treated, at length one Eleazar, a principal man of the city, of the priests family, a lawyer by profession, far advanced in years, known and well esteemed by many of Antiochus's servants by reason of his age and character, was brought before him. Antiochus, beholding the man, spoke to him in the following manner: "Before I proceed to use any severity, let me "advise thee, reverend old man, to preserve "thy life by submitting to eat of swine's flesh; "for I pay great respect to thy age and gray "hairs, and am surprized, that the experience "of so many years should not have made thee "wiser, than still to persevere in the Jewish "superstition. It seems to me a most unreasonable thing for men to abridge themselves "of any innocent pleasures, and great in"justice to themselves and ingratitude to na"ture, to refuse any of those enjoyments

* This expedition and all that followed upon it is expressly attributed to Heliodorus. 2 Mac. iii.

† Seleucus Nicanor was succeeded by Antiochus Soter, but Seleucus Philopator by Antiochus Epiphanes.

‡ Three thousand six hundred and sixty talents weighed four hundred twenty seven thousand three hundred and fifty eight pounds, and nine ounces; and their value in silver amounted to one million three hundred fifty two thousand four hundred and six pounds, and five shillings; and in gold to twenty millions, nine hundred and thirty eight thousand, and five hundred pounds, English money.

" which her bounty hath provided for us. Why " ſhould'ſt thou then expreſs ſuch abhorrence " of that moſt delicious of all meats, which " ſhe ſeems, in the fleſh of ſwine, to have de- " ſigned as our beſt entertainment, and a ſin- " gular favour? This may in others ſeem " ſomewhat more excuſable, but in you, who " are a perſon of better judgment, it would " be a moſt unaccountable folly, to be pre- " judiced by a falſe and empty notion of re- " ligion, and for an idle fancy to contemn my " authority, and draw a needleſs puniſhment " upon your own head. Wilt not thou then " ſuffer thy eyes to be opened, and be awak- " ened out of this dream of thy peculiar per- " ſuaſion, and ſet thyſelf free from the bon- " dage of ſo moroſe and ſingular a notion? " Will this friendly expoſtulation prevail for " no deference to be paid my kindneſs? and " the compaſſion I have for thy age, move thee " to no compaſſion upon thyſelf? Methinks it " ſhould; for though what I have ſaid does " not convince thee of the vanity of thy opi- " nion in this point, yet you muſt needs al- " low, that if there be a power above, which " does, as you ſuppoſe, require the obſervance " of this religion, that power hath ſo much " goodneſs, as to pardon the tranſgreſſion of " his laws, when this is not the offender's own " act and choice, but the effect of force and " pure conſtraint."

ELEAZAR having heard theſe words, beg- ged of the king liberty to ſpeak for himſelf: which being granted, he did in the preſence of all the aſſembly, deliver himſelf to this ef- fect: "Be pleaſed to underſtand, royal ſir, " that we, who are fully convinced, that it " is our duty, in all things to behave ourſelves " according to the law given us by God, are " perfectly perſuaded, that no neceſſity can " more oblige us, no force be ſtronger upon " us, than that by which we ſtand bound to " obey his law; and for this reaſon we think " our acting contrary to it, cannot be diſpen- " ſed with on any terms whatſoever. Nay, " though our law were not, as you are pleaſed " to ſuggeſt, really divine, yet, ſir, I muſt " crave leave to ſay, that ſo long as we con- " tinue to believe it divine, that very perſua- " ſion ought to be an effectual reſtraint upon " us, from violating, or thinking meanly of, " any religious ordinances eſtabliſhed by it. " Do not therefore imagine, ſir, if we ſhould " ſubmit to defile ourſelves by unclean meats, " that this would be reckoned a ſmall and " pardonable fault. For the preſumption of " the offender is the ſame, and the authority " of the law equally inſulted, be the inſtance " in which a man tranſgreſſes greater or leſs. " The fact itſelf makes no difference in point " of guilt. Next you were pleaſed, ſir, to " ſpeak contemptuouſly of our religion, as an " inſtitution unbecoming men of reaſon, and " philoſophy. But I muſt be bold to ſay, it " is the beſt and moſt conſummate philoſophy; " for it teaches us temperance, the conqueſt " of our paſſions and deſires, and ſets us above " all our pleaſures. It trains us up in the " exerciſe of fortitude, and commands us to " undergo all manner of pain willingly and " chearfully. It teaches us the moſt exact " juſtice, and orders us to confine our wor- " ſhip and abſolute reverence, to the one true " God, where alone they are of right due. " Upon this account we dare not eat things " prohibited and unclean; for we are fully " perſuaded, that God who created our nature, " had due regard to it; that the very inſtitu- " tion of this law was ſo far from a hardſhip, " as in itſelf to be an act of goodneſs and " mercy; and that the things forbidden are " hurtful to our ſouls; whereas thoſe allow- " ed for food, are uſeful and convenient for " us. It is therefore the very extremity of " tyranny, to force us, not only to ſin againſt " our law, but to eat that which is therefore " not allowed us, becauſe of a quality not fit " to be eaten. But this, ſir, is a ſort of tri- " umph which I ſhall never give you over me. " Nor muſt I falſify the ſolemn oaths, and " holy engagements, whereby our anceſtors " have bound themſelves and their poſterity " to the faithful obſervance of this law; not " though you ſhould command my eyes to be " bored out, and my bowels to be burnt. No, " ſir, old age hath not ſo impaired my mind, " or enfeebled my body, but that when reli- " gion and duty call me to it, my reaſon can " yet approve itſelf youthful and vigorous. " If this reply provoke you, prepare your in- " ſtruments of torture, and heat your furnace " hotter ſtill; all that ſhall not move me to " ſpare my old age, ſo as for the ſaving my " perſon, to violate the law of my country, " and my God. No, holy law to which I " owe my inſtruction, I will never deſert ſo " excellent a maſter; no, thou deareſt of all " virtues, temperance, by which we preſerve " our native ſovereignty over our appetites, I " will never abjure thee; no, thou beſt of all " philoſophy, I will never diſgrace thee; no, " holy order of prieſthood, and ſtudy of the " law, I will neither forego, nor be a blemiſh " to you. My anceſtors ſhall find me come " to you pure and conſtant, a ſoul as free from " ſuch a ſtain, as undaunted under all manner " of torments even unto death."

CHAP. VI.

WHEN he had made this noble reply to the tyrant's treacherous exhortations, the ſoldiers that ſtood by, handled him very roughly, and dragged him in rage to the place of execution. There firſt of all they ſtripp'd off his clothes; then having pinioned him, they ſcourged him with whips, on both ſides, till they had perfectly flay'd him; and an of- ficer on each ſide crying at every ſtroke, obey the king's commandment. But the brave Eleazar was no more moved by their ſcourg- ings, than if all he endured had been but a dream. The good old man ſtood with his eyes lift up to heaven, his fleſh torn off from his ſides, to the very bone, the blood ſtream- ing down from his body to the ground, till at laſt, being no longer able to bear up againſt ſuch wounds and pains, and loſs of blood, he fell down upon the pavement: but this was an infirmity confined to his body, for ſtill his mind was as erect, as far from being bent as ever. Hereupon one of the mercileſs ſoldiers ſtamped upon his belly, and ſpurned his ſides and ſtomach to raiſe him up again. Still he ſuſtained their barbarous inſolence, deſpiſed the force they put upon him, and bore his pains with ſo much magnanimity, that even he who lay under the torment, vanquiſh'd the hard-hearted wretches that inflicted it, and moved their admiration by ſo reſolute and noble a ſoul, in a body ſo aged and infirm.

SOME of theſe therefore, partly in mere pity to his years, and partly upon the account of former acquaintance with him, though they were ſervants to the king drew near and ſaid, "Why do you thus, for no manner of reaſon, expoſe yourſelf to all theſe ſufferings? "Permit us, Eleazar, to ſet before you, ſome "lawful and clean meats, and do you make as "though you did eat ſwines fleſh according to "the king's command; ſo ſhall you ſave your "life, and yet commit no wickedneſs." But Eleazar anſwered, "Far be it from us, who "are children of Abraham, to be guilty of "ſuch cowardice and wicked ſubtilty, by ſo "much as ſeeming to do an act that does not "become us. How abſurd would it be for "me who have led a life of ſincerity and truth "hitherto, and preſerved my reputation free "from blemiſh, by a ſtrict obſervation of the "law, to change my courſe now in extreme "old age, and ſet an ill example to others? "to purchaſe a little remainder of life at the "expence of foul diſſimulation, and live that "little while a ſcorn and laughing-ſtock to all "the world, for my fear and baſe compliance?" When they perceived him thus reſolute and inflexible, and that their pity could have no manner of influence upon him, they changed their diſpoſition, and brought him to the fire. There they applied new inſtruments of torture, threw him upon the fuel, and as he burnt, poured ſcalding and ſtinking liquors up his noſtrils. Whilſt in the mean while, his body was burnt to the very bone, and he ready to expire, lifting up his eyes to heaven, he ſaid, "Thou ſeeſt, my God, the miſeries I endure, "and that I chuſe to die by fire and torment, "for the ſake of thy law, when it was in my "power to preſerve my life by tranſgreſſing "it: be thou therefore gracious, O Lord, to "thy own people, and let the vengeance exe-"cuted on me, ſuffice for what they have de-"ſerved; make thou my blood a purification "for them, and accept my life inſtead of their "lives." And with theſe words the holy man gave up the ghoſt.

THIS example ſure will put it paſt diſpute, that reaſon improved by religion, is maſter of men's paſſions; for if the paſſions were ſuperior to reaſon, it is to them that the praiſe of this noble teſtimony to truth and conſtant virtue ought to be aſcribed. But ſince this inſtance makes it plain, that the conflict lay between reaſon and the paſſions, and that the former was victorious, we cannot without great wrong deny, that reaſon is the governing principle in every man. And ſure it would argue a very perverſe obſtinacy to pretend the contrary, after ſo full a demonſtration, not only of bodily pains, but likewiſe of pleaſures too, reſiſted, and vanquiſhed, as hath been produced; ſince it is evident the tendency of our paſſions, is conſtantly no other, than to indulge pleaſure, and to decline pain.

CHAP. VII.

FOR in the caſe of this reverend father Eleazar, we may imagine duty, and a good conſcience to be like a ſhip toſt in a tempeſtuous ſea of paſſions, while reaſon, like a wiſe and good pilot, ſate ſteering at the helm; the man blown hard and beaten about with a ſtorm of menaces and barbarous uſage, driven down and almoſt ſunk by the ſwelling ſurges of racks and fires, but ſtill maintaining his poſt, and not letting the rudder go, till he had brought his veſſel into the haven of a bleſſed immortality. Never did beſieged city make ſuch a defence againſt the ſtratagems and furious aſſaults of the enemy that attacked it, as this holy perſon, when defending his ſoul againſt the attacks of ſtripes, and tortures, and death, and defeating all that laid ſiege to him by reaſon, engaged in the cauſe of religion. The good father fixt his mind like a promontory in the waters, which ſtood unſhaken, and broke the waves of paſſion when beating moſt furiouſly againſt it.

O Prieſt moſt worthy of that holy function, who didſt refuſe to defile thy conſecrated mouth, and wouldſt not ſuffer that belly which was a veſſel of God, and always fed with hallowed ſacrifices, to receive ſo impure a mixture, as meats, unclean by law, and offered to falſe Gods! O preacher of the law, and maſter of that beſt philoſophy, which God's own word hath taught us! O noble pattern ſet to all that ſacrifice with their own blood, and ſtand up in vindication of the law, defending it againſt the inſults of paſſion, with generous ſweat and toilſome conflict! Thou, holy father, haſt brought glory to our excellent conſtitution by thy ſufferings and patience, and convinced the world, what mighty efficacy the philoſophy which came down from heaven hath upon minds well reſolved not to reproach, but to reflect honour back upon, their holy profeſſion! O wonderful old age ſtronger than torture! O zeal hotter than fire! O thou moſt glorious of all conquerors, who thus haſt led thy paſſions in triumph! As heretofore our father Aaron, armed with a cenſer, ran into the midſt of the people, and vanquiſhed the deſtroying angel who conſumed our anceſtors by fire from the Lord; ſo did Eleazar, deſcended from the ſame Aaron, hold faſt the dictates of his mind, and conquer in the midſt of thoſe flames that devoured his body round about. And, which is moſt aſtoniſhing, when age and infirmities had enervated his outward man, his inward exerted a moſt youthful and invincible vigour. O happy old age! O venerable grey hairs! O life of integrity and ſanctity unqueſtionable, when conſummated and atteſted by the ſeal of ſuch a death! Num. xvi. 46.

WHAT fuller evidence can be deſired of the ſway reaſon bears above the paſſions, than a man in years, deprived of his natural ſtrength, more apt to fear, leſs able to encounter ſevere trials, enduring ſo much with ſuch undaunted courage? But leſt the objector ſhould have it to ſay, that this in age is leſs to be wonder'd at, becauſe as ſtrength and courage, ſo the paſſions and love of life too, may then be ſuppoſed to be conſiderably abated; I ſhall proceed to ſhew that even young men, whoſe reaſon has been well fixed upon true principles, have undergone, and overcome, tortures yet ſharper and more amazing than theſe.

CHAP. VIII.

AFTER the tyrant had made this experiment to his loſs, and found himſelf and all his barbarous ſtratagems out-done by one one poor old man, enraged at this defeat, he gave orders to bring ſome others of the Hebrew captives before him; promiſing to releaſe them immediately, upon condition they conſented to eat of unclean meats; but in caſe of refuſal, threatning them with greater cruelties, than any he had yet inflicted.

In purſuance of this order, there were brought before him ſeven brethren with their antient mother. The men were beautiful and well-ſhaped, ſo charming in their perſons and behaviour, that the tyrant, fierce as he was, could not forbid himſelf being taken with them. And therefore after viewing them with a ſenſible delight, he ſmil'd upon them, and, commanding that they ſhould draw near to his throne, he accoſted them as follows:

"Young men, I own myſelf to be a great "admirer of your beauty and comelineſs, and "have upon that account kind intentions to- "wards you: nor can I but pay a more than "ordinary reſpect to your family, which hath "the unuſal bleſſing of ſo many ſuch brothers "as you. To adviſe therefore, that you "would not be guilty of the ſame mad and "moſt abſurd zeal, with that poor old bigot, "whom you ſaw periſh in the midſt of ago- "nies and tortures, is a kindneſs far below "what I deſign for you. No, I invite you to "comply with me, with an aſſurance of my "particular friendſhip. For I have it in my "power to oblige and advance them that o- "bey me, in as eminent a manner, as I have "(you ſee) to puniſh thoſe that ſtand it out "againſt my commands. Take my word "then, you ſhall not fail of preferments, but "have places of honour, and profit, and great "truſt in my affairs, provided you will re- "nounce your country's cuſtoms, and be con- "tent to live after the Greek manner, laying "aſide the fooliſh diſtinction of meats, and "indulging thoſe appetites and pleaſures free- "ly, in which youth, never fond of reſtraint, "muſt needs find a delight now denied you "by the tyranny of your own ſuperſtition. "Conſider too, that if ſuch advantagious of- "fers be rejected, you muſt expect that your "obſtinacy will be the more provoking, and "I ſhall be obliged to make every one of you "examples, by a death as full of pain and "horror, as the anger of an incenſed king "can inflict. Be perſuaded to pity your own "ſelves, when I, a ſtranger, and an enemy, "have ſet you an example of pity. Throw "not laviſhly away ſo much youth and beau- "ty, which I am very loth ſhould periſh; but "periſh it muſt, unleſs you will ſave it; and "for that there is but one way. Therefore "conſider well; methinks you ſhould conſi- "der, and not reſolve too raſhly, when I aſ- "ſure you, that in caſe of diſobedience, you "have nothing to expect but racks, and fires, "and death."

Having thus ſpoken, he order'd the inſtruments of torture to be brought; that by producing theſe he might work more ſtrongly upon their fear, than by words and menaces, and thereby frighten them into a compliance with eating forbidden meats. When the ſoldiers had ſet before them wheels, pullies, ſcrews, racks, winches, wedges, iron gantlets, boots, caldrons, frying-pans, bellows, combuſtible matter, and other ſuch like engines of horror and execution, the tyrant, taking the advantage of the impreſſion he ſuppoſed theſe ſpectacles would make, applied himſelf to them once more to this effect: "Young men, "be wiſe in time, and dread the weight of an "angry king's hand; your compliance is no "longer now a wilful offence, and you need "not doubt, but the juſtice of that Being "you worſhip, will conſider the hardſhip of "your caſe, and allow for the conſtraint you "lie under." But neither could his treacherous allurements flatter them, nor the ſight of theſe diſmal inſtruments of vengeance affright them out of their duty. They were ſo far from yielding through fear, that their reſolution grew ſtronger, and by the power of reaſon they triumphed over his barbarity; for what can we ſuppoſe would have been the meaſures taken upon this occaſion, had there been but any one perſon timorous, or inordinately fond of life in that number? Would not ſuch a one preſently have addreſs'd himſelf to the reſt in a reply like this? What ſtupid and foolhardy wretches are we, thus to continue deaf to the invitations and kind advice of a king, who calls us to gain and promotion upon our obedience? Why ſhould we ſupport ourſelves with vain imaginations, and perſiſt in a fatal obſtinacy which can get us nothing but death? Shall we be ſo inſenſible as to have no regard to theſe dreadful engines of cruelty? None to the menaces of an unrelenting tyrant, brutiſh enough to put in execution all that he hath threatened? Shall we not rather abandon this empty point of Honour, and that falſe pride of conſtancy that is certain to prove our deſtruction? Sure it can be no crime, to have ſome reſpect to our youth, which may ſtill ſee many happy years; ſome pity to our poor aged mother, whoſe grey hairs muſt be brought down with unſpeakable ſorrow to the grave, to ſee ſo many ſons cut off at once, and herſelf made childleſs in an inſtant by our diſobedience! What the king ſays is very rational, that God is too juſt and good not to make allowance for the hard circumſtances we lie under: why ſhould we then throw ourſelves out of life, at a time when we are beſt fitted to taſte the ſweets of living? Why hurry ourſelves headlong out of a world where every thing conſpires to delight and entertain us moſt agreeably? Let us not ſtrive any longer with our fate; nor buy applauſe ſo dear as at the expence of racks and death. The law itſelf is not ſo ſevere as to condemn for involuntary offences; and the more juſt our fears are, the leſs there is of will in the compliance. What pretence can we have then for this reſtiffneſs? Or why ſhould we be ſo fond of a miſtaken courage, which is indeed no better than deſpair and obſtinacy; when nothing but death is before us, if we ſtand out; and life and ſecurity, plenty and pleaſure, are as ſurely ours, if we ſubmit?

CHAP. IX.

BUT theſe brave youths, though then in ſight of death, and tortures worſe than death, let no ſuch words fall, had no ſuch diſhonourable thoughts; the reaſon is, becauſe they had attained to a maſtery over their paſſions, and were above terror and pain. So far above them, that as ſoon as the tyrant had admoniſhed admoniſhed them, (as you have heard) to eat of his forbidden meats, they all with one voice, as if all had been animated with one and the ſame generous ſoul, made him the following reply.

"To what purpoſe, O king, is this delay? "If with deſign to know our final reſolution, "be aſſured, we are ready to encounter death "in its moſt frightful ſhape, rather than tranſ-"greſs the laws of our fathers. For, beſides "the reverence due to the examples of our "anceſtors upon other accounts, this is what "our obedience to the law, and the precepts "of Moſes, require from us. Do not then at-"tempt any more to perſuade us to apoſtacy; "do not put on a counterfeit pity for them "who know you hate them; even death itſelf "is more ſupportable, than ſuch an inſulting, "diſſembling compaſſion, as would ſave our "lives with the loſs of our innocence. You "think to terrify us by threatnings of death "and torture, notwithſtanding the ſame ex-"periment made upon the old man, hath ſo "lately taught you, how ineffectual all ſuch "methods are upon the ſervants of the true "God; and if the old men of our nation en-"dure ſo couragiouſly ſuch exquiſite pains for "their religion, is it reaſonable to ſuppoſe "that the young ones will ſuffer the reproach "of coming behind them in conſtancy and pa-"tience? As we have been educated under "his inſtructions, ſo we ſhall conquer after "his example. Try us therefore, ſee if it be "in your power to deſtroy our ſouls, when we "ſuffer in the cauſe of God and religion. No "ſir, this is impoſſible, your cruelty cannot "hurt us; for all the effect our pains can have "will be to ſecure us the glorious rewards "due to unſhaken patience and injured virtue. "But upon you the conſequence will be very "different and dreadful, for by the murder "of ſo many innocent men, you arm the di-"vine vengeance againſt yourſelf, and for the "temporal which you inflict, will become "obnoxious to everlaſting torments."

This anſwer ſo enraged the tyrant, that he reſolved to proceed againſt them, not only as diſobedient, but unthankful men: and therefore gave the word, that the executioners ſhould bring the eldeſt to the torture; which they immediately did, binding his hands, ſtripping off his clothes, and faſtening his arms in a poſture for receiving the ſcourge. But finding that they wearied themſelves in vain, and that all their ſtripes were to no manner of purpoſe, they clapp'd him upon the wheel. The noble youth lying extended here with his bones broken, and every limb of his body out of joint, reproached his tormentor thus: "O "monſter of wickedneſs, enemy of God and "juſtice, and abandon'd to cruelty and rage, "thou doſt not treat me thus inhumanly for "murder or villany, or for any breach of di-"vine or human laws, but purely for my zeal "to God, and his holy ordinances." The ſoldiers hereupon exhorted him to conſent, and eat of the king's meat, that he might deliver himſelf from any farther ſufferings. But he returned; "No: you miſtake in ſuppoſing "your wheel to have gotten the better of me; "no, with the cruelſt inſtruments of barba-"rity you cannot ſtrangle my mind, nor diſ-"locate my reaſon; cut this body piecemeal, "burn my fleſh in the fire, and ſtretch my "yielding limbs till they crack and fly aſun-"der; the exquiſite malice of your tortures "ſhall convince you, by this trial made upon "my perſon, that it is the peculiar glory of "the ſons of the Hebrew nation, to be invin-"cibly firm in their ſufferings for virtue and a "good conſcience." Then they put fire under him, and, drawing the pullies ſtreighter, turned his body thus miſerably extended to the flames. Inſomuch that all the wheel was beſmeared with blood, the coals underneath were put out by his bowels dripping into them, and all the ſpokes and pins of the engine were cover'd with clotted blood, and pieces of fleſh torn off from the body, till nothing was left of human form; but a skeleton of broken bones.

Still this brave youth and true ſon of faithful Abraham, was never heard to utter one complaint or groan; but ſuſtained the rack with ſuch magnanimity, as if the fire had only ſerved to refine him into a creature immortal and impaſſable. At laſt he cried out, "Be "ſure, my brethren, that you follow this "pattern; do not deſert me in this noble con-"flict, nor diſclaim that relation of generous "conſtancy, by which we are allied in ſoul, "more nearly than in blood. When you en-"gage in defence of religion, it is an holy "and a glorious warfare; and never doubt "but that the tender providence of that fa-"ther above, juſt and gracious, whom we "worſhip, will not only reward us, but be "propitious to our whole nation, and certain-"ly humble this haughty bloody tyrant, with "puniſhments as uncommon and amazing as "his own pride and cruelty." When the pious youth had uttered theſe words, he gave up the ghoſt.

While the ſpectators ſtood aſtoniſh'd at this undaunted courage, the guards advanced with the ſecond brother. Him they bound faſt to the pully, and drew on the iron gantlets with ſharp nails: then enquiring whether he would accept the conditions of eſcape, and eat before they began the torture, and finding by his anſwer, that he was in the ſame noble reſolution with his brother, the furious wild beaſts fix'd their iron gantlets into his neck, and drew off all the fleſh from his muſcles, quite up to the chin, and flay'd off all the hair and skin of his beard, face and head. But he bearing this terrible pain with great temper, ſaid, "How welcome is death in any ſhape, when "a man ſuffers for truth and religion? Art "thou not ſenſible, thou brutiſh tyrant, that "thou art now thy own tormentor more "than mine? The indignation thou conceiveſt "for having thy wicked deſigns defeated, "and all thy barbarity vanquiſh'd by my con-"ſtancy in a good cauſe, frets and gnaws thy "ſoul more than all theſe pains do me. For "the pleaſures of virtue and the comforts of "a clear conſcience, ſoften my ſufferings and "ſupport my ſpirits. But thou art rack'd in-"deed, with all the cutting apprehenſions of "a guilty mind. What I now ſay, thy own "breaſt ſtrongly ſuggeſts to thee, that ſo "wicked a wretch as thyſelf cannot poſſibly "eſcape the terrible vengeance of a juſt and "angry God."

CHAP.

CHAP. X.

WHEN this man too had undergone a death ſo much to his honour, the third was brought, and preſs'd hard with arguments and intreaties from ſeveral hands, that he would eat and live. To which he anſwer'd with great vehemence, "You ſeem not to know "how nearly I am related to thoſe that have "died here before me: alas, the ſame father "and mother brought us into the world, and "the ſame maſters form'd our minds, and we "always acted upon the ſame principles: and "ſhall I then in this laſt ſcene of life renounce "the honour of that ſtrict alliance, to them, "whom I have never yet given occaſion to be "aſham'd of calling me brother?" This anſwer, deliver'd with ſuch an air of reſolution and firmneſs, enrag'd the executioners; who, to expreſs their malice and reſentments, clapp'd his hands and feet preſently into the ſcrews, and with a violent wrench put out all the joints of his fingers and his toes at once; this done, they ſtill continued to draw the engine yet higher, till they had twiſted his arms and legs and ſhoulder-bones out of their ſockets; and finding him ſurvive all theſe diſtortions, dragg'd off his skin at the ends of his fingers, and flay'd him from the very crown of the head. Not content to have mangled his body after this mercileſs manner, they dragg'd him to the wheel, where being yet more diſtended upon the pins and ſcrews, he ſaw his ſeveral parts burſt aſunder, his fleſh drop off by piece-meal, and his bowels and blood guſh out. When he was at the point of death he cry'd, "O thou "moſt wicked and inhuman of all tyrants, we "ſuffer thus for the religion and law of a God "who is able to reward us; but thou ſhalt "ſuffer pains much more inſupportable, much "more inexpreſſible, for thy impiety and barbarous cruelty."

AFTER this perſon had endured as became a brother of that renowned family, the fourth was hauled to execution; but perſuaded firſt, "That he would bethink himſelf, and be "wiſer than thoſe that had gone before him." His anſwer was, "You cannot heat your "fires ſo much hotter for me, as to make me "a coward after ſo noble patterns of martyr-"dom already before my eyes; nor will I ſtain "the honour of my blood. Try me, thou "tyrant, and let all thy tortures prove, whe-"ther I be not a branch of the ſame ſtock, and "animated with the very ſame ſoul, with "thoſe whoſe blood thy impious hands have "ſpilt and torn them limb from limb; but all "in vain, with all the horror and pain that ma-"lice and deviliſh rage could contrive." The ſavage and moſt profligate Antiochus, incens'd at this, commanded immediately to cut out his tongue. Whereupon he proceeded: "Ah, "how impertinent a cruelty is this! 'Tis to "great purpoſe that you take away the organ "of ſpeech, from one who truſts in a God that "ſeeth the heart, and hears the inward mo-"tions of them that are ſilent. Here, it is "ready for your inſtruments, looſe to your "hand; but know, when you have cut it out, "you cannot do the ſame execution upon my "reaſon, nor make my mind dumb. O that "I could be ſo happy to loſe my life by in-"ches, and glorify God with every member "and joint of my body, by having them "maim'd, and lopp'd off one by one for his "cauſe and glory. But as for thee, guilt and "vengeance will quickly overtake thee, who "cutteſt out theſe inoffenſive tongues, that "are employ'd in making melody and ſinging "praiſes to the God who form'd their "ſpeech."

CHAP. XI.

NO ſooner had this brother exhauſted with pain, and miſerably mangled, finiſhed his courſe, but the fifth ſprung forward of his own accord, crying out: "To ſhew thee, "tyrant, what impreſſions theſe tortures make "upon me; ſee here I come, not content to "wait thy tedious orders, offering myſelf to "the trial, and deſirous to loſe no time in ſo "noble an exerciſe of virtue. The ſooner "thou diſpatcheſt me, the ſooner ſhall my "bliſs, and thy iniquities be full; and I ſhall "help to make thee ripe for vengeance, by "adding one more to the number of them "whoſe innocent blood thou haſt ſhed. Tell "me, thou devourer of mankind, and enemy "of all goodneſs, what could provoke, what "poſſeſs thee to deſtroy our race after this "mercileſs inſulting manner? Is it become "a capital crime for men to devote themſelves "to the ſervice of the great creator of the "world, and make a conſcience of governing "their actions, by an excellent law of his "preſcribing? No ſure, this conduct ought "not to expoſe men to tortures, but entitle "them to rewards and honours." While theſe words were yet in his mouth, the ſoldiers dragg'd him down, and bound him to the pullies; to which, when they had ſcrew'd in his knees, they clapt on iron footlocks; and drawing the ſcrews, diſlocated his loins, ſo that he lapp'd round the wheel like a ſnake; and being disjointed all over, had his bones broken in an inſtant. Thus, being almoſt ſtrangled, and in unſpeakable anguiſh by the ſtoppage of his breath and bodily pain, he ſaid, "Full ſore againſt thy will thou con-"fereſt on us favours, which were never in-"tended: for the more exquiſite our torments "are, the nobler proof thou giveſt occaſion "for of patience invincible, and ſteadfaſtneſs "in our religion."

WHEN he was dead, the ſixth youth was preſently brought forward; and, being ask'd by the tyrant, whether he would accept deliverance? he reply'd, "Though I in years "come behind them that ſuffered before me, "yet is my ſoul of equal maturity with theirs. "For in regard our deſcent and education "was the ſame, 'tis fit, that ſince the cauſe "we are call'd to aſſert is the ſame, our death "ſhould likewiſe be the ſame. If then thou "art diſpos'd to put me upon the ſame trials, "know, that I will take care to die innocent, "and keep the ſupport of a good conſcience "under my torture." Hereupon they faſten'd him to the wheel, and, after having broken and diſtorted all his bones, put fire under him; then did the ſoldiers heat ſpits and ſpears red hot, and thruſt them into his back and ſides, till his very bowels and intrails were burnt up. In the midſt of which torments, he cry'd out, "O glorious conflict, in which ſo many "brethren have engaged for their religion,

" and all come off with conqueſt: for a mind " rightly inform'd in the truth, and arm'd " with ſteddy principles of virtue muſt ever be " impregnable. I will bear my brethren com- " pany in ſo noble a death, and add to the " number of the plagues due to thee, O wick- " ed inventor of artful cruelty, and implaca- " ble foe of all that adhere to the true reli- " gion. Six of us now have baffled thy ma- " lice and rage; for I muſt needs account thee " baffled, when ſo much hath been done with- " out any ſucceſs, to force us to forego our " duty, and comply with thy wicked propoſals. " Thy fires, methinks, are cold, thy racks " eaſy, and thy guards are now no longer " tormentors and executioners, but defenders " and promoters of our law and its honour, " ſince they aſſiſt us in giving teſtimony to it, " and contribute to the triumphs of the religion " they are not able to ſuppreſs.".

CHAP. XII.

WHEN this man had made ſo bleſſed an end, being diſpatch'd at laſt, by caſting him into a cauldron of boiling liquor, the ſeventh and youngeſt appear'd; whom, when the tyrant ſaw fetter'd and pinion'd, though ſo implacably outragious againſt the reſt of his brethren, his hard heart began a little to relent. Calling him therefore up near to the tribunal where he ſate, he began to try him by ſoft words and fair means. " You ſee (ſaid he) " young man, the miſerable end which the " reſt of your family have by their own ob- " ſtinate folly brought themſelves to: for all " theſe tortures and tragical ſpectacles of death, " are indeed the conſequences of their own " wilfulneſs and diſobedience; and the ſame " will be thy fate in a very few minutes, if " their examples have not made thee wiſer. " But I hope better things, and for an en- " couragement of thy better behaviour, do make " thee here a generous proffer of my love and " particular friendſhip, and promiſe to promote " thee in my kingdom to places of very great " eminence and profit." Not content with theſe perſuaſions to the ſon, he ordered the mother to be brought before him, to whom he addreſſed himſelf with a ſeeming compaſſion for her loſs, intreating her to prevail upon her child, in pity to herſelf at leaſt, to ſave this ſmall remnant of the family, and not to give her the affliction of having all her offſpring ſo ſadly torn away at once. But he, receiving from his mother in the Hebrew language, the advice which I ſhall mention hereafter, cry'd out all on the ſudden; " Well, " then, unbind me, and let me have liberty " to apply to the king and his friends that at- " tend about the throne." The company was overjoy'd at this propoſal, and immediately let him looſe; which he taking the advantage of, ran haſtily to the ſide of the cauldrons and frying-pans, and ſaid; " Thou moſt ungodly " tyrant, and unparalell'd monſter of baſeneſs " and villany, that haſt received from the " hand of God a kingdom, and ſo many bleſ- " ſings of this world, and yet, without the " leaſt degree of ſhame or remorſe, murdereſt " the ſervants and friends of him who thus " advanced thee; is this the requital thou " makeſt to a bountiful God, to cut out the " tongues, and by racks and tortures mutilate " the limbs of thoſe that worſhip him; and " for no other reaſon, but becauſe they wor- " ſhip him as he himſelf hath directed? Be " well aſſur'd, this ſhall not be forgotten; " but juſtice will purſue and find thee out; " and in the mean while lay up in ſtore for " thee torments and fires, not like thine here, " that quickly conſume the body, and the " more fierce they are the ſooner they end our " pain; but thoſe ſhall be a treaſure of fire " inexhauſtible, of pains which whole ages " will not end, but freſh and fiercer conti- " nually, till time ſhall be no more. Art thou " a man, thou wretch, more ſavage than the " wildeſt of brutes! And haſt thou no regard, " no manner of relenting for theſe moſt ex- " quiſite and ſtudied pains of them who have " the ſame nature, the ſame tender ſenſe of " ſufferings with thyſelf? Is it poſſible a " creature of like matter and form, ſhould take " delight in mangling, burning, flaying, " ſcourging and killing his fellow creatures? " Yet ſuch, it ſeems, art thou, unlike indeed " to us in diſpoſition, and as unlike in thy " fate and portion. For we, who die to ſcaſt " thy malice, have done our duty, and ſhall " find favour and happineſs with God; but " thou, whoſe cruelty hath put theſe ſtout " champions of the truth upon vindicating it " with ſo much cauſeleſs pain, ſo undeſerved a " death, ſhalt howl for ever in deſpair; and, " when too late, curſe and be plagu'd with " the bitter reproaches of this guilty day's " tranſactions. So dreadful, and ſo infamous " is thy caſe; ſo bleſſed, and ſo glorious that " of my martyr'd brethren; whoſe honours " and rewards, think not that either flattery " or fear ſhall exclude me from; for know, I " aſpire to an equality with the beſt of them, " and think it long and loſt time, till we meet " again in the ſame ſufferings here, and the " ſame bliſs above." With that he caſt himſelf into the pans, and expir'd in the hotteſt of the fire.

CHAP. XIII.

AND will it now admit of any diſpute, whether reaſon, guided and ſupported by religion, hath the ſuperintendency over the paſſions, when we ſee ſeven brothers, in perfect agreement, and upon the ſame principles, vanquiſhing and deſpiſing the moſt exquiſite pains and death? is it not manifeſt, that, had theſe men been govern'd by their paſſions, they had ſubmitted to pollute themſelves with unlawful meats; refuſed no conditions to procure eaſe and ſafety; and been (what all the world muſt have call'd them) ſubdued? But now the face of things is quite otherwiſe; they ſhine and reign triumphant; their paſſions were abſolutely quell'd, reaſon aſſerted its dominion, and for ſo doing receiv'd praiſe of God. Nor is it poſſible to conſider this whole proceeding without ſeeing and acknowledging the ſuperiority of the mind, and the entire defeat of all the attempts made upon it, by paſſion and pain. How great a wrong would it be, to deny theſe martyrs the trophies of this bloody field, and not allow them the character of men proceeding magiſterially, by the rules of right reaſon, when they had their paſſions in ſuch perfect ſubjection, that even the extremity of fires and racks could not give theſe paſſions ſtrength enough to rebel? For as the moles and forts upon the ſhore break all the force of the waves and weather, and render the harbour commodious and ſafe to ride in; ſo did this ſeven-fold fortification of reaſon protect the port of duty and religion, from all the ſtorms and boiſterous inundations of paſſion.

How moving, how noble a ſight was ſuch a company, encouraging and aſſiſting each other in the exerciſe of their piety, like the voices which contribute every one by his diſtinct part to make up a perfect melody? With ſuch a harmony of hearts, did they call out; "Come, my brethren, let us remember "who we are, and in what cauſe we fight, "and let us ſtand it out for our God and his "law, by dying like true brothers. Did not "the three brave youths in Aſſyria defy the "furnace of the king of Babylon? and to "what purpoſe have we thoſe examples, if "they do not provoke us to a generous imi-"tation?".

When religion and a good conſcience are at ſtake, let us abandon all ignoble fears, and act with reſolution becoming ſo glorious a cauſe. One cry'd out, "Courage, my dear "brother; another, perſevere bravely; a "third, remember who you are, and from "what anceſtors you ſprung; Abraham was "your father, who was content with his "own hand to ſacrifice his ſon; and Iſaac, "who as willingly ſubmitted to be ſlain by "that father's hand." And all in general, looking on each other with countenances ſerene and highly pleaſed; all ſtout and recollected in their own minds, cry'd out, "Come and "let us chearfully conſecrate our ſouls to our "God: Let us thus pay him back the lives "he lent us for his ſervice; and give up theſe "bodies for the uſe and defenſe of his moſt "holy law. Why ſhould we ſtand in fear of "one, who only ſeems to kill the body? the "only danger worthy of our dread is that of "ſouls abandon'd to torments everlaſting, and "that can never be the ſad fate of ſuch as keep "and honour, but of them only who tranſ-"greſs and forſake, the truth. Let us then "arm ourſelves with a holy fortitude; ſo ſhall "Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob receive us when "we die: ſo ſhall all our pious anceſtors con-"gratulate and applaud our conſtancy, when "we are arriv'd at the regions of bliſs and "immortality."

And as they were dragg'd one by one to execution, they whoſe turn was not yet come, encourag'd thoſe that went before them thus: "Take heed, my brother, how thou demean-"eſt thyſelf, and be ſure to do nothing that "may diſgrace either thoſe of our number "that have gone before thee, or us who are "about to tread in the ſame ſteps." Theſe muſt needs have been very engaging exhortations: for none of my readers can be inſenſible what charms, what powerful influence ſo near a relation carries with it; what tender affections the all-wiſe providence hath infus'd into their hearts, who have deriv'd their ſubſtance from the ſame father, and lay in the womb of the ſame mother, where every brother found the ſame receptacle, dwelt the ſame term of time, and was form'd into man by the ſame proceſs of nature; perſons nouriſh'd by the ſame blood, and brought to due maturity by the ſame informing ſoul; afterwards ſucking the ſame milk, ſuſtained at one common table, converſing perpetually under the ſame roof, educated by the ſame care, inſtructed by the ſame teachers, and initiated in the ſame religion. And ſuch was the affection, ſuch the endearments, and conſequently, of ſuch weight and efficacy the admonitions and mutual encouragements, of theſe ſeven brethren to one another: for they were brought up in the ſame faith, train'd up in the exerciſe of the ſame virtues; and, the better men they were, the better ſtill muſt they needs love each other. For natural affection is never ſo happily improv'd, as by perfect agreement in goodneſs and united zeal in the love and ſervice of God: and as each of theſe would love the reſt more tenderly in proportion as himſelf was more religious, ſo would he neceſſarily, in the ſame proportion, and upon the ſame account, become more worthy to be belov'd by all the reſt. And yet we may obſerve in this very caſe a mighty conqueſt of reaſon over paſſion; for though theſe brethren had all the tender concern that nature and blood, birth and education, acquaintance and perſonal worth, could inſpire them with; yet were theſe manifold endearments ſo vanquiſh'd and borne down, when religion and their ſouls lay at ſtake, that in a cauſe ſo noble, the very tortures, agonies, and deaths of their deareſt relations, gave a ſenſible ſatisfaction to thoſe of the number who yet ſurviv'd, and were the undaunted, nay, even pleas'd ſpectators of them.

CHAP. XIV.

THUS did they, by theſe exhortations to endure the torture, not only work themſelves up to a contempt of pains, but ſubdue brotherly affection, and the tendereſt and moſt prevailing part of human nature itſelf. O minds more abſolute than the moſt ſovereign princes, more free and noble than the nobleſt birth could make them! not one of theſe generous youths expreſs'd the leaſt fear, not one made the leaſt demur; but without ſhrinking back at death in its moſt horrible and dreadful appearances, they made the beſt of their way to racks and fires, as men that were running the race of immortality, and impatient, with the utmoſt ſpeed poſſible, to come up to the goal. And as the hands and feet, and other members of our body do with all alacrity and eaſe imaginable move as the ſoul dictates and directs; ſo ready, ſo perfectly agreed and uniform in all their motions towards death, were theſe heroic youths, puſh'd on by the principle of religion, which like one common ſoul animated them all. O heavenly conſtellation of ſeven conſenting brethren! for, as the ſeven days in which the world was created give us the Idea of God, and ſhew the perfection of his majeſty and goodneſs; ſo do theſe ſeven renowned martyrs, by running the whole circle of pains and tortures, compoſe one finiſh'd piece of conſtancy and courage, and teach us that perfection of fortitude, which baniſhes the ſlaviſh fear of death. But alas! how far ſhort of this pattern do we ſtop, we, who who cannot now ſo much as read or hear without trembling and amazement what they not only heard, not only ſaw, but felt and bore it all without the leaſt diſorder of mind?

What can be more inſupportable than fire, that pierces and ſeparates, and conſumes in an inſtant? yet the acuteſt pains, apply'd to the parts moſt tender, and of quickeſt ſenſe, did theſe ſtout champions conſtantly endure.

Nay, to encreaſe our wonder more, and abate that notion of fortitude which men, too partial to themſelves, are apt to boaſt of as the peculiar glory of their own ſex, I ſhall make good my aſſertion concering the ſovereignty of reaſon over the paſſions, by a moſt aſtoniſhing inſtance of a woman; one exercis'd by ſufferings more ſharp, more complicated, than any of thoſe hitherto mention'd. For who can conceive the extremity, the variety of that pious mother's pains, who herſelf was tortur'd and put to death in every one of her ſeven ſons? do but reflect how the bowels and natural affection of parents does terminate, and draw them, as it were, to their children, as to the proper centre of all their care and concern. This is what we obſerve even in brute beaſts, which ſeldom or never fail to expreſs a tenderneſs to their young, equal to that among men. But why do I ſpeak of beaſts, when all nature is full of it, and even the ignobler ſpecies of creatures want not a viſible and ſtrange kindneſs for their own breed: for even the bees themſelves, when intent upon the buſineſs of waxing, guard and defend their hives; and as oft as the drones invade them, know how to make their ſtings do the office of ſwords and other military weapons, in revenge of the wrong done by thoſe that would attack their little ones.

CHAP. XV.

But ſo true a daughter of Abraham was the mother of theſe gallant youths, that even compaſſion for her own children could not ſhake her principles, or tempt her to break in upon her duty. Such was her noble zeal, that when two things were offer'd to her choice, religion and the preſent ſafety and great preferment of ſeven ſons, ſhe wiſely gave the preference to religion; took God's word before the king's, and choſe to have them live for ever with him in heaven, rather than enjoy a ſhort proſperity with Antiochus upon earth. What words ſhall I find to deſcribe thoſe tender paſſions of parents, that ſtrange union between them and their children in nature, which, after a wonderful manner, draws upon their offſpring the ſame lines and features of body, and impreſſes the ſame diſpoſitions of ſoul? how ſhall I tell the concern they feel for theſe images and parts of themſelves, when in any manner of diſtreſs? how, eſpecially, that of mothers, whoſe weaker minds, and natural exceſs of fondneſs, render them ſtill more ſenſibly touch'd with whatever affects their children, than fathers are wont or expected to be? and even this mother was not leſs, nay, ſhe was much more under the influence of this affection than common mothers; ſeven painful births had made as many additions to this love, and every time her travail was repeated, it was a freſh exerciſe of it, a freſh and ſtronger endearment to all ſhe had endured the ſame pangs for.

But notwithſtanding all this, the fear and love of God, overlook'd the preſent eaſe and advantage of her children. And never did ſhe love them ſo tenderly, ſo deſervedly, as when their ſteddy virtue, and conſtancy in the truth, charm'd her affections, and endear'd them to her; for they were juſt and wiſe, temperate and magnanimous, affectionate to each other, and dutiful to their mother to that degree, that they even died in the cauſe of their law, in obedience to her. For ſhe was ſo far from allowing any one of theſe manifold engagements to betray her into an undue tenderneſs, or ſuffering any of the yet more manifold tortures inflicted upon her children to ſhake her reaſon; that, mother tho' ſhe was, ſhe earneſtly exhorted each of her children ſingly, and all of them together, not to decline any ſufferings or death for the ſake of religion.

O nature, common mother of us all! O parents love, unaccountably engaging our ſouls! O anxious care of tender infants! O ſympathy of mothers irreſiſtable! ſee here a prodigy, ſeven children one by one, rack'd, burnt, fry'd, a mother ſtanding by, and looking on, and yet ſo firm her piety, not chang'd by the killing ſpectacle! ſhe ſaw the fleſh of her own ſons broiling in the fire; the joints of their hands and feet torn off, and ſtill trembling and panting on the ground, when rent from the body; the skins of their heads and faces drawn off like vizards, and caſt down at her feet; all this the wonderous woman ſaw unmov'd. O mother, now in agonies and racking pains for thy children, compar'd with which thy bearing throws were eaſy! O woman, who of all thy ſex ſeemeſt alone to have brought forth conſummate virtue! thy firſt-born when expiring did not ſhake thee, nor thy ſecond ſon, when caſting upon thee a piteous languiſhing look; nor thy third, when groaning out his ſoul; nor the eyes that ſtarted out of every one of their heads with extremity of pain, and ſetting in death. Thou didſt not let one tear fall, when one hand was cut off after another, one head flayed after another, one corpſe fell upon another, and heaps of thy own fleſh lay before thee. The ſongs of Syrens, and the dying notes of ſwans, make not ſo melodious muſick, as did in thy ears the laſt accents of thy own offspring, calling to the in the midſt of their torments unconceivable, and dying agonies. For in thy ſoul when warm debates aroſe, and nature and affection pleaded ſtrongly, and the pains and unparalell'd ſufferings of thy children added weight to their arguments; yet ſtill thou turned the deaf ear; and when thou wert urged moſt vehemently to give ſentence for thy childrens lives, wouldſt not accept a ſhort deliverance with guilt, but gaveſt them up to death in proſpect of a more laſting bliſs. Then didſt thou approve thyſelf a true daughter of Abraham, an heireſs of all his faith and fortitude. O mother of a family, zealous for the law, bulwark of true religion, and laden with the conqueſts won by thy own bowels! O woman of generoſity and patience, more manly than the ſtouteſt of men! glory of thine own ſex, and exceller of ours! for, as the ark of Noah, which then contain'd all the ſurviving world, rode triumphant upon the waters of the general flood; ſo thou, whoſe Gen. vii.

breaſt included all true piety, wert toſt upon the waves of all manner of contending paſſions, and beaten upon with the boiſterous winds of torments that blew hard from every quarter, and yet didſt bravely weather out the ſtorm, ſupported by thy zeal for God and religion.

CHAP. XVI.

NOW then, (to return to the point I am all this while aiming at) if an old woman, and the mother of ſeven children, could not only ſuſtain, but ſee thoſe children dying in ſuch miſery, in conſideration of the cauſe they ſuffered and died for, the conſequence is unavoidable, that reaſon, ſupported by religion, hath a power ſuperiour to our paſſions. And that this is the caſe of human nature in general, I have made it plain, becauſe not only men have conquer'd their paſſions, but a woman hath perfectly ſubdued and deſpiſed the moſt exquiſite ſufferings. The lions, into whoſe den Daniel was caſt, were tame; the furnace of Miſael, tho' heated ſeven times hotter than uſual, was cool, in compariſon of thoſe fierce paſſions, that fire, which natural affection and pity had kindled in her breaſt, when ſhe ſaw ſeven ſons ſucceſſively expire in agonies inexpreſſible; and yet reaſon and religion quenched all the rage of theſe ſo furious, ſo manifold affections.

FOR is it not rational to ſuppoſe, that had this woman had the leaſt allay of puſillanimity in her temper, all the mother would have burſt out in lamentations and doleful complaints, like theſe? "O moſt unfortunate creature, "and expoſed to an unparallel'd variety of mi-"ſeries, who was lately happy in ſeven ſons, "but am now no longer a mother! O my ſe-"ven unprofitable travails! O the loſt cares "of nurſing, which have nouriſhed children "only for racks, and fires, and deaths unex-"ampled! In vain, my dears, have I been in "pangs for you, in vain endured the many "anxious days and reſtleſs nights, the coſt "and labour of a painful education. O thoſe "beloved children, whoſe faces I ſhall never "ſee more, nor rejoice in their marriage and "poſterity, nor have the ſo much valued "bleſſing of being eſteem'd happy in my de-"ſcendants of the ſecond and third genera-"tion. And yet I once was happy, happy a-"bove my neighbours, both in the number "and the goodlineſs of the branches that "ſprang from this fruitful vine; but now a "wretched ſolitary widow, deſtitute of ſo "much as one out of my many ſons, to com-"fort and aſſiſt me while living, or to bury "me when dead."

BUT the piety of this excellent mother diſdained ſuch effeminate complaints, and was ſo far from deſiring any of her children to live, that it would have been matter of grief to her, had they not died as they did: her mind firm and impenetrable as a rock, conſidering that this was to bring forth over again the number of her ſons, by a new and better birth, to a life of immortality. And therefore ſhe herſelf beſought them to fulfil her joy; and encouraged them in dying for the cauſe of religion. O noble matron, who liſtedſt thyſelf in the ſervice of the ſame cauſe, and didſt aſſiſt in engaging the tyrant, and approve thyſelf mighty in deeds and in words! For when thou wert apprehended with thy ſons, and an eye-witneſs of the tortures and dolorous death of the good Eleazar, then didſt thou in the Hebrew tongue excite the courage of thy ſons, by ſaying, "See here, my children, what a "glorious conflict is this! And if you alſo be "called to the like, conſider what a teſti-"mony, what an honour it will be to our na-"tion! but eſpecially conſider the law of your "fathers you are to ſuffer for, and be ſure to "behave yourſelves in this encounter valiant-"ly and chearfully! What a reproach ought "you to think it upon the vigour of your age, "if an old man, weakened and ſpent by years "and infirmities already, did yet endure ſuch "variety, ſuch extremity of tortures for his "duty, and thoſe who have all the fire of "youth to excite and ſupport their zeal, "ſhould ſhrink back at, or ſink under the ſame "trials! Conſider, my dearer parts of my-"ſelf, what life is, and whence you had it. "God gave it you at firſt; the goodneſs of "his providence hath continued it to you ever "ſince. It is therefore his due, and what you "ought to pay, when he calls for it again. "Can you decline any ſort of pain for him, in "obedience to whom our father Abraham made "no delay to ſacrifice his ſon, the promiſed "father of our nation? Nor did that ſon "tremble or once give back, when he ſaw a "father's hand arm'd with the weapon of "death, and lifted up to give the fatal ſtroke. "Was not the innocent and pious Daniel, by "his own conſent, caſt as a prey to hungry "lions; and the three children into a fiery "furnace? Theſe all endured manfully for "the ſake of God; and you, who are partak-"ers of the ſame faith, ought not to ſhrink if "you are made partakers of the ſame ſuffer-"ings. For indeed it is moſt abſurd for them "who have a true ſenſe of religion, to betray "a cowardly degeneracy of mind in any dif-"ficulties that it ſhall engage them in." Thus did the mother of ſeven children animate every one of the number, and repreſent to them the reaſonableneſs, and the neceſſity of dying, rather than baſely yield to violate any one command of their God; eſpecially when aſſuredly perſuaded that they who die for him, continue ſtill to live with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, and all the godly patriarchs, in manſions of immortal felicity.

Some of the ſoldiers gave out that ſhe alſo was to be ſeized, and put to death, which coming to her ear, in order to prevent all attempts upon perſon, ſhe voluntarily caſt herſelf into the fire. O glorious mother, thus defeating the tyrant's rage and violence, diſappointing all his wicked contrivances, and exerting a moſt vigorous and noble faith, firm as a ſtrong built houſe; erected upon her ſeven pillars, and proof againſt all ſhocks that laboured to overturn it! Take comfort, holy matron, whoſe patience was ſupported by a firm truſt in God, and well-aſſured hope of a future reward. The moon encircled with her retinue of ſtars, ſhines not ſo bright in the firmament of heaven as doſt thou, reflecting light upon, and receiving it back again from, thy ſeven illuſtrious ſons, fix'd in the heavenly manſions, and honourable in the preſence of God. Thy race were truly Abraham's, and every one a genuine ſon of the father of the faithful. Were it a poſſible undertaking, to draw this whole action as in a picture, and relate every circumſtance in true and lively colours, our paſſions ſcarcely could ſuſtain the mere repreſentation: nor would the mother and her children, expiring in ſuch cruel variety of torments, be ſeen but in ſuch deſcription without horror. And were a monument, as they well deſerve, to be erected, for a never dying memorial to the nation they are ſo great an honour to, this or ſome like inſcription might become it: "Here lies a reverend old prieſt, "an ancient mother and ſeven gallant ſons, "put to death by the rage of a tyrant, at- "tempting, but in vain, to overthrow the "Jewiſh law and conſtitution: for theſe brave "champions ſtood in the gap, aſſerted the "rights and religion of their nation, commit- "ted themſelves and their cauſe to God, and "perſevered in deſpight of torments and "death." For indeed the encounter was truly divine; virtue was in this caſe the judge of the combat, and diſpoſer of the prize, and patience was the proof and exerciſe. To this the victory was to be adjudged, and immortality and bliſs eternal were the rewards of them that conquer'd.

The firſt that march'd into this bloody field, was Eleazar: the mother of ſeven ſons offer'd herſelf likewiſe to the combat; her ſons ſucceſſively undertook the conflict; the adverſary they encounter'd was the tyrant, the ring of ſpectators was the world, and the conqueror religion; who both vanquiſh'd in their perſons, and crown'd her champions that fought ſo bravely in her vindication. And who indeed could ſee, who can hear the noble atchievements of theſe heroick ſouls, ſo zealous for the law of God, without (I ſay not approbation and praiſe, but) wonder and aſtoniſhment? Nay, even the tyrant and his impious aſſeſſors, that counſell'd and countenanced the barbarous executioners, could not without amazement obſerve that invincible patience which ſuſtain'd them; and in deſpight of all their inhumanity and obſtinate prejudice, revered the piety they labour'd in vain to corrupt.

So true is that of Moſes, "All his ſaints are "in thy hand". For theſe men being ſanctified as an offering to God, are celebrated with honour and immortal renown. Nor was the benefit of their noble trials confin'd to their own perſons, but the blood of thoſe righteous men ſhed upon this occaſion, was accepted by God as a propitiatory ſacrifice, inclin'd him to return to his people in mercy, and by a gracious providence deliver Iſrael from the heavy load of oppreſſion they then groaned under. For even Antiochus, conſidering the wonderful virtue and reſolution of theſe men, and their inflexible conſtancy under hardſhip and pain, gave teſtimony to their valour, and by a publick officer propounded it as a pattern fit to be imitated by all his own ſoldiers. Not only ſo, but taking his meaſures of the whole nation by theſe few, he liſted many of them in his ſervice, employ'd them both in ſieges and pitch'd battles, and, having obtain'd many ſignal victories by their aſſiſtance, learn'd by his own experience, that religion inſpires men with the trueſt courage, and that none are capable of ſerving their prince in the wars, comparably to thoſe undaunted and generous contemners of life, who dare to encounter death and tortures for God and a good conſcience. O race of faithful Abraham, and inheritors of his zeal, ye ſeed of Iſrael the beloved, ſet yourſelves to obſerve and pay due reverence to this divine law, to govern your affections in all points according to it, and live up to the perfection of its dictates and diſcipline, whoſe efficacy is ſo undeniable, and its glory ſo conſpicuous, in ſuch unparallel'd inſtances of reaſon thus conducted, attaining to an abſolute maſtery over the paſſions.

CHAP. XVIII.

NOR does this maſtery extend only to thoſe inward diſorders, which raiſe a tumult in our own breaſts, but (as theſe examples of men delivering themſelves willingly to the torture for the ſake of their religion make it exceeding plain) to afflictions from without alſo, and the acuteſt bodily pains. Thus did theſe noble heroes fight and conquer, and (for acquitting themſelves ſo gallantly) were not only commended and admir'd of men, but largely rewarded by God. Nor did they vanquiſh death and torments only, but alſo the enemies that inflicted both: by reſtoring peace to their nation, and bringing into requeſt again the regard for that long neglected law, the contempt whereof provok'd God to ſcourge the people with, this worſt of all calamities, the tyrant Antiochus. But while he became an inſtrument of vengeance to others, he treaſur'd up yet more againſt himſelf. For finding all his efforts to no purpoſe, and that neither flattery nor force could draw the Jews to abandon their own, and conform to foreign cuſtoms, he drew off from Jeruſalem and made war upon the Perſians, and long it was not ere the juſtice of God overtook him, even upon earth, by a moſt miſerable death.

But ſtill to do all right to that wonderful woman, I ſhall add here ſome other of her pious exhortations to her no leſs wonderful ſons. "Conſider, ſaid ſhe, the converſation of your "mother, who lived a long time a chaſt un- "ſpotted virgin; I never wander'd from my "father's houſe, nor did any luſtful corrupter "of youth aſſault me in the field, nor that "ſerpent which ſeduced Eve tempt me into "any impure embraces. The flower of my "age I paſt in the ſtricteſt conjugal fidelity to "my husband. When you, my children, were "grown up, your father died, happy in the "eſteem of all that knew him. He had the "ſatisfaction of many proſperous children, "and eſcap'd the misfortune of ſeeing himſelf "depriv'd of theſe bleſſings. While he con- "tinued with you, no pains were ſpared to "inſtill pious principles, and furniſh you with "inſtructions proper to prepare you for the "trying difficulties of this important day. He "taught you with great diligence the law and "the prophets; he ſet before you the renown- "ed examples of patience, and ſuffering vir- "tue: Abel murdered by his own brother "Cain: and Iſaac deſigned for a burnt offer- "ing; and Joſeph impriſoned for his obſtinate "chaſtity; and Phineas zealous for the law "of his God. He preached to you the vir-

" tues and the glorious rewards of Ananias,
" Azarias and Miſael, and Daniel caſt into the " den of lions. He frequently put you in " mind of that preſerving providence to thoſe
" that are God's; which Eſaias magnifies in
" theſe words: When thou paſſeſt through
" the waters, I will be with thee, and thro'
" the rivers, they ſhall not overflow thee; when
" thou walkeſt through the fire, thou ſhalt not
" be burnt, neither ſhall the flame kindle upon
" thee. He taught your infant tongues that ſong
" of David; Great are the troubles of the righte" ous, but the Lord delivereth him out of all;
" and call'd upon you to obſerve that maxim of " Solomon in his proverbs, That wiſdom is a tree
" of life to all that obey and lay hold on her.
" He quicken'd up your faith by that paſſage in " Ezekiel, Shall theſe dry bones live? Nor did
" he forget to teach you that heavenly ſong of " Moſes, who ſays in the perſon of God; I kill
" and make alive: and again pronounces of the " law and the diligent obſervance of it; This " is your life, and the prolonging of your days.

O doleful day, and yet not doleful but glorious rather, when the mercileſs Grecian tyrant kindled his impious fires, heated his murdering cauldrons, and with ungodly rage, more hot and fierce than both, dragg'd and bound to the engines of torture, and exercis'd with all manner of agonies and pains, the ſeven-fold offspring of this daughter of Abraham! when he bor'd out their eyes, cut out their tongues, and put them to death, with all the ſtudied cruelties that wickedneſs and malice could invent. Theſe impious barbarities the juſtice of God did then, and always will, avenge upon the proud inflictors; but theſe ſons of Abraham, with their victorious mother, are by a very different fate, tranſlated from miſery to bliſs unſpeakable, admitted into the joyful and triumphant ſociety of all their pious anceſtors, and have receiv'd again thoſe unblemiſh'd ſouls, which they willingly ſacrificed in his ſervice, pure and immortal, at the hands of that God, with whom they were ſo chearfully depoſited, and to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

CHAP. I.

The author's preface upon the ſubject of human frailty, and the power and providence of Almighty God.

HOW long are we to act like boys at fourſcore, our heads covered with grey-hairs, and not one grain of ſenſe in them! This is the condition of all thoſe that place their reſt upon the ſtability of fortune, on the one hand, and at the ſame time abandon an infallible guide, in the dictate of reaſonable nature, on the other; though nothing ſo fickle under the ſun as the former, or ſo ſteddy and unchangeable as the other. At this rate we confound and invert the order and value of things, as if there were no more in it than the ſhuffling of counters, while we take certainties for uncertainties, and uncertainties for the contrary. And what's the reaſon of all this now, but that weak and ſhort-ſighted men ſee beſt at hand; and give more credit (right or wrong) to their ſenſes; than to their judgments? Whereas fore-ſight, with a reſpect to things to come, and things inviſible, muſt be the work of argument and reaſoning: not but that the eye of the ſoul is much quicker and ſharper than that of the body; ſaving only where the point of it is taken off, either by luxurious exceſſes in eating and drinking, or by a ſtupid unthinking indolence; the greater miſchief of the two.

WE ſhall never need to look farther than into the hiſtory of theſe times, and the many wonderful things that have fallen out in this juncture, for the proof of an over-ruling providence: a providence, that takes particular care of all virtuous holy people, but more eſpecially of thoſe, that with humility and reverence give themſelves up as a peculiar heritage to the worſhip and ſervice of the Almighty. Theſe are the people that the Chaldeans call Iſraelites, [or Seers of God:] which is a bleſſing more valuable than the treaſure of ten thouſand worlds. Now if the preſence of a perſon venerable for his age, as a governor, a tutor, or a father, ſhall have ſuch a power over us to keep us in awe, and within the compaſs of modeſty and reſpect, in our lives and manners, what advantages may we propound to ourſelves then in the elevation of our thoughts beyond all created Beings, and the inuring of our ſouls to the contemplation of an uncreated Power! even God himſelf, who is goodneſs, beauty, and bleſſedneſs in the higheſt degree: and all theſe excellencies infinitely ſhort yet of his unſpeakable perfections. For how is it poſſible to expreſs in words, a point utterly inexplicable; or to advance, by the ſcale of his attributes, to the underſtanding of an incomprehenſible myſtery! A myſtery ſo inextricable, that if the whole creation were but one tongue, it would not ſerve to explain explain it: as his omnipotency in the making of the world; his ſovereignty, in the monarchical form of it; the wiſdom of his providential conduct, in the order and government of it; and the juſtice of his proceeding toward both good and bad, in the retribution of rewards or puniſhments. Nay, and the vengeance itſelf is to be reckon'd among the things that we are the better for: not only for the natural equity ſake of dealing by all men according to their demerits; but as chaſtiſement proves many times the means of bringing people to a ſight and ſenſe of their crimes, or as it hinders them at leaſt from perſevering in their wickedneſs; for the puniſhing of one man is frequently the preventing the ruin of another, for fear of the ſame ſeverity in caſe of the ſame offence.

CHAP. I.

The bleſſed condition of the ſeven months reign of the emperor Caius Caligula, after the death of Tiberius.

THE emperor Caius Caligula, that ſucceeded Tiberius, may ſerve for a lively inſtance in confirmation of what I have been ſaying: never ſo univerſal a peace and agreement thorough all the provinces both by ſea and land: eaſt, weſt, north and ſouth, all in a profound quiet; Greeks and Barbarians, ſoldiers and burghers, living together like brethren, and in the mutual exchange of all neighbourly offices of friendſhip and commerce. This was ſuch a tranſcendent pitch of felicity as can ſcare be credited, for a young prince to be welcomed to the throne with an affluence of all the good things that his very heart could wiſh: a prodigious treaſure, both in money and plate, wrought and unwrought, and as well for ornament as for convenience: a mighty power both at ſea and land, and the whole habitable world contributing, as out of an inexhauſtible fountain, toward the maintaining of his armies. His empire was bounded with two great rivers, the Euphrates, and the Rhine, the former bordering upon Germany and other barbarous nations; the other, upon the Parthians, the Sarmatians, and the Scythians, &c. a race of people not one jot leſs barbarous and unciviliz'd than the other: ſo that from the ſun riſing to the ſun ſetting, as well upon the continent as in the iſlands, there was nothing but gladneſs and univerſal ſatisfaction: while Rome, Italy, and all the provinces of Europe and Aſia, kept holy-day, as we ſay, in a perpetual feſtival. Never were people, in fine, by the bleſſing of providence, ſo free and eaſy under any other prince: for every private man had ſo large a ſhare in the common welfare that his good fortune left him nothing more to ask: there was hardly any thing to be ſeen up and down the towns, but altars, victims, ſacrifices, candidates, garlands, chearful looks, feaſting, merry meetings, muſical concerts, racing, treating, dancing to the flute and harp, with all other recreations imaginable: and the poor all this while as well ſatisfy'd as the rich; common people as perſons of quality; ſervants as their maſters; debtors as their creditors: ſuch, in ſhort, was the felicity of thoſe times, for plenty and pleaſure, and the univerſal ſatisfaction of perſons and families of all ranks and degrees, that it look'd as if the poets fiction of Saturn's golden age were no longer a fable. And this was the bleſſed ſtate of things for the firſt ſeven months of Caius's reign.

CHAP. II.

The emperor Caius fell deſperately ill in the eighth month of his reign, to the great affliction of the provinces for his diſtemper, and as great a joy afterwards for his recovery.

CAIUS, in the month following, and in the very glut of his good fortunes, happened to fall extremely ill; for having quitted the tempelare, and conſequently the healthful courſe of life he led under Tiberius, he gave himſelf up to the court-liberties of luxury and riot: as eating and drinking to exceſs; the unſeaſonable uſe of baths: nay, and to eat and drink to ſatisfy would not ſatisfy him neither, without a vomit after it to make way for more. He had plung'd himſelf likewiſe into all manner of uncleanneſſes, with both ſexes indifferently, from common appetites to the moſt unnatural of luſts. He did all that was poſſible, in fine, by ſenſuality, and debauch, towards the dividing of ſoul and body: for as health and ſtrength are a bleſſing that naturally attend ſobriety and good order, ſo the contrary way of government is as certainly followed with weakneſſes, ſickneſs, and death.

IT was now about the beginning of autumn, which is the ſeaſon when the return-ſhips from all quarters are upon their laſt voyage, homeward bound, back again. Thoſe I mean that would not winter abroad. By the accident of this opportunity, the ſtory of the emperor's ſickneſs was immediately diſpers'd over the whole world, and by that means the univerſal contentment and ſatisfaction that the people enjoyed before the coming of that news, turned into as univerſal a mourning. Upon this change, the towns and the houſes were all in tears and lamentations, in proportion to the meaſure of the comfortable condition they were in before. The provinces themſelves were all ſtruck in the very perſon of the emperor, and in a more ſenſible manner too; for Caius ſuffered only in his body, but the people in their minds, for fear of loſing not only their peace, but their lives, liberties, and eſtates alſo; for which they were ſolicitous, even to the degree of deſpair. Beſide that, conſidering the fatal conſequences that commonly attend the death of princes, whether by famine, war, or otherwiſe) as rapine, depopulations, baniſhments, plunder, impriſonments, fears, dangers, and death itſelf) all theſe things conſidered, they could never think themſelves ſafe, or happy, but in the well-being of their prince.

THE emperor was by this time upon the mending hand, whereupon the welcome news of it was diſpatched in a trice to the furtheſt quarters of the earth; (for fame flies like lightning.) The people took this for an earneſt of better tidings, and fell into a violent impatience upon it to hear further, till at length their longing was gratify'd by ſeveral expreſſes in words at length, that the emperor was perfectly recovered; which was the ſame thing to the provinces, as if they had been recovered themſelves, and reſtored to their former ſtate and humour of jollity and eaſe: thoſe in the iſles, as well as thoſe upon the continent. Finally, there was never heard of in the memory of man, ſuch a tranſport of joy in any one people or nation, for the preſervation of any particular prince, as was ſeen upon this occaſion, quite thorough the univerſe, for the ſafety of Caius when reſtor'd to his health again. It look'd like a tranſition (all in a moment) from a ſavage life to a ſociable and civil; from deſarts to political communities, from confuſion to order; and all theſe advantages owing to the government and protection of a generous and a rightful prince. But people were glad of many things without ſeeing thorough them.

CHAP. III.

The horrible ingratitude and cruelty of the emperor Caius toward young Tiberius.

IT was not long before Caius gave the world to underſtand, that their judgments were blinded, their meaſures miſtaken, and that they governed themſelves more by gueſs than by knowledge. For this famous prince, who ſeem'd to promiſe nothing leſs than a profuſion of bounties and favours to all Europe and Aſia, and one who was likely to be the moſt illuſtrious benefactor to all glorious purpoſes publick and private that every were heard of: this prince, I ſay, proved a monſter; or rather, he took off the mask, and owned himſelf bare-faced for what he was.

THE emperor Tiberius, had by his ſon Druſus, young Tiberius, and by Germanicus Caius Caligula, whom he recommended in preference to the ſucceſſion; provided only, that he ſhould ſhew the ſenſe he had of the obligation, in his reſpects to his grand-child. But this did not ſatisfy Caius yet, to hold that by adoption, which the other had a right to by birth; ſo that moſt barbarouſly and ungratefully, he cauſed his near kinſman, the co-heir of the empire, and the next ſucceſſor to Tiberius, to be put to death, under a pretext, that this Tiberius had contriv'd a plot upon the life of Caius; a very unlikely project for a youth of his tender age to engage in. Beſide that it was generally thought that if the young prince had been but ſome few years older, the emperor would have declared Tiberius his ſucceſſor; for he was grown jealous of Caius already and upon taking him out of the way, the other would have had the empire to himſelf in courſe. But Caius, inſtead of ſharing the ſovereignty with his kinſman, as in juſtice he ſhould have done, entered into an execrable practice upon his life; and the way he took to compaſs his end was this. He ſent for Tiberius in the firſt place, and then calling a council of his friends about him, he made them a diſcourſe much to this effect.

"As to this young man, ſays he, (ſpeaking of Tiberius) I have not only the kindneſs of a couſin-german for him, but the love and tenderneſs of a brother; and there is nothing in this world my heart is ſo much ſet upon, as to take him in for partner in the government, according to the appointment of his grand-father, in his laſt will and teſtament. But youth, alas! without experience, ſtands in more need of a governor itſelf, than of a commiſſion to govern others. If it were not for this difficulty, how glad and ready ſhould I be to eaſe myſelf of one part of the cares and troubles of my office, over ſo many nations, by dividing the burden, for fear of ſinking myſelf under the weight. But in the mean while, let him depend upon me for protection and advice; not only as a governor to his pupil, but as a father to a ſon, which for the future (and pray take notice of it) ſhall be the ſtile betwixt us."

This harangue wrought ſo effectually upon the whole council, and the young prince himſelf too, that the very ground-work of the plot was now as good as ſecured by it; for inſtead of confirming the adoption, and poſſeſſing Tiberius of what he had a title to, it made void the grant of what was given him already: ſo that Caius was now left at liberty to treat his collegue and co-partner in the empire, at what treacherous rate he pleaſed. For the Roman law gives parents an abſolute authority over their children, and it gives the ſupreme magiſtrate alſo as uncontroublable a power over the people, acting all things at will and pleaſure; ſo that Caius had no more to do toward the gaining of his point, than firſt to declare Tiberius an enemy, and then to treat him like one, whether he were one or no. And this he did, without any regard, either to his years, or to an old acquaintance; or finally, to his quality, as a perſon that had been trained up by the emperor in a proſpect of the ſucceſſion: for after the death of Druſus, Tiberius was to be reputed a ſon rather than a grand-child.

THERE goes a report, that Caius commanded Tiberius to do execution upon himſelf, and at the ſame time ſtrictly prohibited ſeveral tribunes and centurions, who were then preſent, to aſſiſt him in the action, upon a point of honour forſooth, that it was not for the dignity of the blood royal to be ſpilt by a common hand. So careful he was of doing things in form, that he made a ſcruple of the very murder itſelf that was not committed according to law, and covered his hypocriſy with a mask of holineſs.

THIS innocent prince, that had never ſeen blood drawn either in jeſt or in earneſt, no not ſo much as in a mock-combat, or the repreſentation of a battle in a time of peace; an exerciſe well known among princes and men at arms: this prince, I ſay, what did he do, but firſt offer his throat to every man he met, and then when he ſaw no body would do him the good office, he took a poinard himſelf, and asked the people where he ſhould ſtrike, to make the ſureſt diſpatch of a miſerable life. They told him how and where, and he followed their direction over and over. After this manner was Tiberius taught in his extremity how to murder himſelf.

CHAP. IV.

Caius puts Macro to death, to whom he ſtood indebted for his life and fortune.

THIS was Caius's maſter-piece, and the great difficulty of his life and reign was now ſurmounted; for he had no competitor to fear, nor any man of credit that was able to make a party againſt him. The next blow was at Macro, wherein he ſhew'd himſelf cruel and ungrateful to the higheſt degree.

THIS Macro had done him many ſignal and faithful ſervices, not only after his coming to the crown, when a paraſite, or a court-flatterer, would have done the ſame thing; but even before his advancement alſo, or I might have ſaid in order to it; for he was look'd upon as the chief inſtrument that prevailed upon Tiberius to make choice of him for his ſucceſſor. Tiberius was now in years, and ever crafty, both upon the account of a natural ſagacity, and a long experience, and one that underſtood men perfectly well: he had entertain'd a great many jealouſies concerning Caius, as a mortal enemy to the whole Claudian family; or if he had any tenderneſs for his relations, it was for thoſe, he thought, by the mother-ſide. This put a great many troubleſome ſcruples into his head, what would become of the poor child if he himſelf ſhould die before him. Neither did he look upon Caius as a perſon competent for the weight of the commiſſion he pretended to, but as a man that had neither ſolid ſenſe nor civility; and one that, by the levity and inconſiſtence of his words and actions, one would have judged ſcarce well in his wits. Macro did all however that was poſſible to be done, for the removing of theſe jealouſies, and the keeping of Tiberius quite and eaſy. He would be often telling him how great a deference and veneration Caius had for his perſon and dignity; and in particular, ſo generous a friendſhip and reſpect for his kinſman, that he would be glad with all his heart to ſee him the ſingle lord of the whole empire, if it might ſtand with the publick good: and that his modeſty and reſerve had the ill fortune to be miſtaken for want of ſenſe and reſolution. But this would not do, and when Macro perceived it, he offered to become bound body for body, that it ſhould be all made good upon the firſt occaſion. Now Macro being a man of a tried fidelity to the Ceſars, and more expreſly yet to Tiberius himſelf in the conſpiracy of Sejanus, (which Macro both detected and cruſhed) there was no room left for a doubt upon the faith and credit of the mediator: for, to ſhorten the ſtory, Macro was never well but when he was doing Caius ſome good office or other, and commending him to Tiberius; at leaſt if it could be called a commendation to defend a man againſt dark ſurmiſes and reports, and uncertain accuſations. But in one word, he could not have done more for the neareſt relation he had in the world, than he did for Caius. Some would have it that this was done in conſideration of the good underſtanding that had always been betwixt Caius and Macro, who was at that time highly in credit with the emperor. Others aſcribed it to an intrigue with Macro's wife, who for ſome private reaſons, beſt known to herſelf, was perpetually importuning her husband on the behalf of the young man, to do him upon all occaſions the beſt offices he could; and there's no reſiſting the charms of a wanton woman that manages with art and addreſs.

Now Macro, who knew nothing as yet that his wife had diſhonour'd his bed, attributed all her fondneſſes and careſſes to the force of a conjugal affection, and was thereby ſo far impoſed upon, that he took the moſt deadly enemies he had in the world for his trueſt friends. He was conſcious to himſelf how faithfully he had ſerved Caius in ſeveral extremities, where his life was at ſtake; and in the confidence of that merit, he had ſome ſort of right, he thought, to be plainer with him than another man; for his buſineſs was, like a great maſter, to make his work perfect, and laſting, by preſerving him both from himſelf and others. As for example, when he ſaw him ſometimes aſleep at the table, he would take the freedom now and then to wake him, with a private hint, that it was neither decent nor ſafe; for it laid him open to any man that had a deſign upon his life. And ſo at any time when Caius was degrading himſelf by giving too fond an attention to buffoons and tumblers, or laughing out-right at the ſcurrilous conceits of a jeſter, or perhaps playing a part himſelf, in a band of common fidlers, if it was Macro's hap to be within reach of him, it was his way to give him a private jog with his elbow, a diſcouraging wink, or ſome ſecret whiſper, and at the end of all, this following admonition.

"IT is not for you, ſir, to ſee, hear, and "gratify your ſenſes, like other men, but you "are to advance yourſelf as much above the reſt "of the world in the dignity of your mind, "as you are in the elevation of your fortune. "For what can be more incongruous, than "for the maſter of the world to entertain himſelf with the amuſements of ſinging, dancing, inſipid jeſting, and other fopperies of "that kind! Whereas it is his part, in all "caſes, times, and places, to uphold the majeſty of an imperial prince, as a ſhepherd ſet "over the whole flock, and be improving his "character daily." But Macro went further yet.

"WHEN it ſhall be your hap, ſays he, to "be at the Circus, the theatre, or any other "publick ſpectacle or exerciſe, you are not ſo "much to attend the thing in itſelf, as the "induſtry in the compoſure, and to reaſon the "matter thus: if people take ſuch care and "pains to pleaſe the ſpectators, without any "benefit to mankind, purely for popular applauſe, and at laſt reckon it as an ample "reward to carry the cauſe with credit, what "ſhall we expect from the profeſſion of a "much more excellent art, that is to ſay, the "art of government, which provides for tillage, planting, navigation, and the ſecurity "of commerce, in the eſtabliſhment of a reciprocal exchange of commodities all over "the provinces for the ſupply one of another? "Not but that ſome perſons and places have "been tainted with a venomous envy for this "bleſſed proviſion and agreement; but the "malignity never went ſo far however, as to "poiſon the whole world; no, nor the greater part of it; here and there a man, or a "family, or perhaps a city or two, might be

" concerned; but for whole countries, or na" tions, there has been nothing of it; eſpe-
" cially ſince your illuſtrious family has had
" the adminiration of the government: but
" the monſters that formerly had the confi" dence to domineer in the very hearts of the " towns, are now glad to ſhift for themſelves,
" like wild beaſts, into caves and hiding-
" holes, and have left us in exchange a bene" ficial intercourſe of correſpondence with all
" quarters of the earth; which is all ſub-
" jected entirely to your good pleaſure and " conduct. This empire, in fine, looks like
" a mighty ſhip, and yourſelf by providence
" ſet at the helm, where you are left an-" ſwerable for the ſafety of the veſſel, as you
" tender the good of mankind. Wherefore
" pray be ſure to have a care of it, and make
" it the buſineſs and comfort of your life, to " promote the happineſs of your people. Pri" vate perſons may do many good offices a" mong themſelves, ſome one way, and ſome
" another, both publick and private; but it
" is from the bounty and wiſdom of the prince
" alone, that the people can ever pretend to " be free and eaſy. He muſt have an open " hand, and a large ſoul, and no bar to his
" liberality, but what ſhall be found neceſ-
" ſary for a reſerve, to anſwer all the ends,
" the needs, and the chances of govern" ment."

HERE was a great deal of good-will and friendly advice caſt away to very little purpoſe; for Caius inſtead of being the better for't, was the worſe; and Macro utterly ruined, over and above, for the good office; his counſel rejected, and his perſon treated with contempt. For Caius had taken ſuch an averſion to him, that when he ſaw him at any time coming towards him, at a diſtance, he would be ſaying to thoſe about him:

" Look you, ſirs, here comes my governor!
" but I thank my ſtars for it, I am out of my " wardſhip: he ſets up for my maſter too, but " I am paſt a boy; and ſo likewiſe for a mo" nitor to one that underſtands the world bet" ter than himſelf. The pedant takes upon
" him to inſtruct an emperor how to behave
" himſelf toward his ſubjects; and an empe" ror much better acquainted in all the arts
" of court-politicks than he can pretend to be.
" This man now has the vanity to act the " part of my maſter; but I would fain know
" where he learnt that skill himſelf that I " want. Alas! I have been trained up from " my cradle to the myſteries of ſtate, under
" variety of tutors; as father, brothers, un-
" cles, couſins, grand-fathers, great-grand-
" fathers; beſide a continued ſucceſſion of ſo
" many great princes in a right line, both by " father and mother, to ſay nothing of the
" ſeeds of royal virtues that ſhew themſelves
" commonly in the forming of a governor.
" For as children many times reſemble their " parents, not in face and manners only, but in " their very motions, humours, habits, geſtures,
" &c. ſo does nature infuſe royal abilities in-
" to the very veins of a governor. And ſhall
" a ſot take upon him now to inſtruct me in " the myſteries of an art that I brought into " the world with me? And yet here's an " obſcure, mean wretch, that has the face to " lie tutoring me upon a ſubject he knows no-
" thing at all of himſelf."

CAIUS was by this time ſo embittered againſt Macro, that nothing leſs than his life would ſerve his turn; and whether the charge were true or falſe, it did not ſignify, provided only matter of accuſation was exhibited againſt him that would bear a colour to make it plauſible. When his head was working upon this thought, a certain expreſſion of Macro's was pitch'd upon, for the ground of an impeachment.

" CAIUS, ſays he, is a man of my making,
" and as much, if not more, obliged to me for
" what he is, than to him that begot him. It " was my intereſt, that not only once, but " thrice, reſcued him from the rage of Tibe-
" rius, when he would have put him to death.
" And then after the death of Tiberius, when " the Pretorian bands were under my com" mand, I gave up my guards into his hands,
" with this monitory precaution, that the em" pire could never be ſafe and entire, but in
" the hands of a ſingle perſon."

This was all true beyond contradiction, and not without the approbation of ſeveral that heard it, who were not as yet acquainted with the dark and ſlippery ways of Caius, and that diſſembling and hypocriſy were his maſter-piece. In ſhort, it was not many days before the unfortunate Macro, and his wife, were both taken out of the way, by a barbarity anſwerable in the other extreme, to the degree of ſo many generous ſervices. But this is the ungrateful man's way of reckoning with his benefactors; and it was an honeſt man's reward too, for ſaving the life of a brute, and ſetting a monſter upon the throne. There goes a report that the man and the woman were both forced to lay violent hands upon themſelves, notwithſtanding the tenderneſs of Ceſar for his miſtreſs. But the gluts and the lothings of an irregular love are unaccountable.

CHAP. V.

Caius puts his father-in-law M. Silanus to death, and ſeveral others.

WHEN this treacherous prince had rid himſelf of the danger of a competitor, and cut off Macro, with his whole family to a ſingle man, in requital for the ſaving of his life and empire, his third exploit was to be upon his father-in-law, M. Silanus, which he look'd upon as his maſter-piece.

THIS Marcus Silanus was a brave man, and nobly born; and his daughter dying young, the father paid Caius the ſame reſpects ſtill, if not greater, afterwards than he had done before; not doubting of a reciprocal return, and not imagining what a weather-cock he had to do withal. Silanus being a frank plain-dealing man, was often deſcanting upon the topick of morals and politicks, as the offices and functions of a prince, and the meaſures of good manners and government. Now this was a freedom that he had ſome ſort of title to, by his quality and ſtation: beſide that the wound of his daughter's death, being yet freſh and bleeding upon him, the ſenſe of the affinity, he thought, could not be ſo ſoon forgotten. But Caius took all manner of good counſel for reproach, and conſequently his beſt friends for his mortal enemies: himſelf being ſo wiſe, ſo valiant, ſo temperate, ſo juſt, and, in fine, every way ſo perfect and accompliſh'd in his own conceit, that he reckoned it as a ſcandal to be charged with the very poſſibility of being better: ſo that whoever pretended to adviſe him, did it at his own peril. He had a quarrel alſo to Silanus, as a kind of check upon him in the courſe of his extravagant luſts; and in that fit of outrage he bad a final adieu to the memory of his dead wife, and followed the barbarity with a treacherous practice upon the life of her own father, and, at the ſame time, to the moſt indulgent father-in-law under the ſun, in the ſame perſon. The fame of this murder, and others little leſs conſiderable, that followed upon it, ſtruck the whole world with horror and indignation, but they kept their thoughts to themſelves, for fear of the worſt. But for the people now, that are eaſily impoſed upon, and firm to nothing; the people, I ſay, were ſo far from believing it poſſible for a prince to be ſo human, candid, and generous one day, and ſo mercileſs, falſe, and bloody the next, that they took upon them the juſtification of what he had done, and to plead the equity of the cauſe in his defence.

As to what concerns the death of young Tiberius: "'Tis againſt nature, they ſaid, to "admit a partner in ſovereignty, and it was "only an act of prevention, to take away the "life of a man that would otherwiſe have "taken away his life, if he had got him in "his power. Now Caius, in this action, was "not ſo properly to be called a murderer, as "an inſtrument of divine providence, in re"moving Tiberius out of the way, for the "common good of mankind, for fear of fac"tions, and parties; ſome drawing one way "and ſome another, ſo as to embroil the em"pire in the miſeries both of a foreign and "of an inteſtine war. Now peace is un"doubtedly the greateſt of bleſſings, and "what is it but an orderly government that "keeps people quiet? that is to ſay, a go"vernment where no competitions are encou"raged by any diviſion of the princes."

They had their reaſonings likewiſe upon the caſe of Macro: "Macro, they cried, was "a proud haughty man; and had forgot the "Delphick oracle, that bids every man [Know "himſelf] giving to underſtand, that who"ever digeſts that leſſon well, can never be "miſerable, nor any man happy without it. "What has a ſubject to do in the province of "a prince, or to take upon him to teach his "maſter his duty? 'Tis the ſovereign's pro"vince to command, and the ſubjects to o"bey." At this rate it is that the ſilly people deſcant upon wholſome counſels and admonitions; partly for want of ſenſe to diſtinguiſh one thing from another; and partly for want of honeſty and plain-dealing, in the confounding both of names and things.

They made alſo a great many carping reflections on the behaviour of Silanus: "How "ridiculous he rendered himſelf in claiming "the ſame authority over a ſon-in-law that "a father had over his own ſon: whereas pri"vate citizens make no difficulty of giving "way to their own children, in caſe of any "honourable charge or preferment; but this "man had the confidence, without the very "pretence of being ſo much as a father-in-"law, to intermeddle in matters he had no"thing to do withal, for the affinity died "with the daughter. Marriage 'tis true, ties "families together for the preſent, but the "death of either party diſſolves the rela"tion."

This was the talk every where, to ſave the emperor's credit as far as poſſible: for the high opinion they had of this prince's character above all others, for bounty and good nature, had ſo far prepoſſeſſed them in his favour, that they could not think any thing amiſs of him, eſpecially upon ſo ſudden a change from one extreme to another.

CHAP. VI.

Caius ſets up for a demi-god.

THESE three horrid outrages committed upon the perſons of Tiberius, Macro, and Silanus, were as good to Caius as ſo many triumphs over the empire; for now theſe three were gone, he had nothing more to fear, either from the imperial family, the ſoldiery, or the ſenate, Silanus being the glory of that illuſtrious body. But now he had ſubjected the world to his power, an arrogant freak of vanity carried him farther yet, and nothing would ſerve him but divine honours, and tranſlating of the emperor into a demi-god. Now the ground of the whimſy was this.

He fancy'd to himſelf, that, "as the maſter "and leader of troops and flocks of beaſts, as "ſhepherds, goat-herds, herdſmen, and the "like, are not ſheep, goats, nor oxen, them"ſelves, but reaſonable creatures, and infi"nitely above them; ſo ſhould the ſupreme "governor of men in ſociety, be allowed to "have ſomewhat in him above the ſcale of "human nature, that may deſerve a place a"mong the gods."

This fantaſtical imagination no ſooner poſſeſſed his head, but the foolery went down with him for a truth; and ſhew'd itſelf ſoon after, in the effects of his blaſphemous phrenſy; as he proceeded farther and farther ſtill by degrees. The firſt ſtep of his ambition was to be a demi-god; ſuch an one as Bacchus, Hercules, Caſtor, Trophonius, Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, and the like. He made himſelf ſport all this while, with their oracles and ceremonies, but ſtill aſſuming to himſelf what he took away from others.

And then he would be changing habits, and perſons, like a comedian upon the ſtage. One while he would act Hercules, with his lion's skin, and his club; another while he would dreſs himſelf with a cap upon his head, and perſonate Caſtor. Sometimes again, he would appear in a Faun's skin, and his Thyrſus wrap'd up in ivy, in imitation of Bacchus. But he had this peculiar to himſelf, that whereas his fellow demi-gods were well enough content with their ſeveral enſigns, and privileges apart, Caius engroſs'd them all to himſelf, for his own greater honour, in the outdoing even of thoſe that he envy'd.

But that which drew the greateſt train of followers after him, was not that he had three bodies like Geryon, but what was more wonderful, the turning of one body into ſo many ſhapes, like the Egyptian Proteus in Homer, who transforms himſelf into animals, the elements of fire and water, and what not?

But what are you the better, Caius, for this way of reſembling the figures of the demigods, without imitating their virtues? The labours and the hazards of Hercules, were all employ'd for the good of mankind, in delivering the world, both at ſea and land, from the monſters that infeſted it. Bacchus planted and cultivated the vines, and drew a cordial drink from them in the juice of the grape, that cheers both body and mind. It lays our cares aſleep, and at the ſame time makes us forget our misfortunes, and hope for better. Wine, in ſhort, gives us health, ſtrength, and activity: private perſons, cities, and families, are all the better for it; and a cheerful cup is but a tranſition from labour to reſt; and when all is done, 'tis a comfort and relief, both to Greeks and Barbarians, and their feaſts, merry-meetings, muſick, and dancings, are wholly owing to it. Let this ſuffice now to the honour of wine.

Now as to Jupiter's two twins, Caſtor and Pollux, the one of them was immortal, they ſay, and the other mortal; and the immortal brother had ſo paſſionate a tenderneſs for the other, that he choſe rather to devolve part of his own privilege upon his brother, and to ſubject himſelf to the fate of other mortals, than to outlive ſo dear a friend: "For, (ſays "he) what will my immortality ſignify to "me, after my brother's death, but an ever-"laſting mourning for ſo irreparable a loſs?" Whereupon, he bethought himſelf of an expedient, to compound the difficulty, by dividing the mortality and immortality of the two brothers equally betwixt them, and fixing two different natures upon the ſame bottom of equity and reaſon.

Now theſe worthies were famous men in their generations, and ſo they continue to this day, both for their perſonal piety, and the good offices they have render'd to the publick; upon which account they have made themſelves venerable for their virtue. But now, Caius, what great or good thing did you ever do, to entitle yourſelf to the honour of a demigod? To begin with Caſtor: inſtead of emulating the heroical bravery of ſo generous a friend and brother, your merit lies in the mercileſs and inhuman murder of an innocent prince, your own fleſh and blood, and rightful co-partner in the empire; and that murder follow'd with the baniſhment of his ſiſters, to ſecure your uſurpation. Or what have you done after the precedent of Bacchus? what new invention, that the world was ever the better for? Is mankind ever the eaſier, or the happier, for you? But, to your praiſe be it ſpoken, you have found out inventions indeed: inventions, that like an epidemical peſtilence turn joy into heavineſs and mourning, and make all people weary of their lives. And pray what's the return you make for the vaſt treaſures that come flowing daily into your coffers, from the four quarters of the earth, to gratify an inſatiable avarice, but inſupportable impoſitions, by unheard of taxes and tributes, to make the burden of the oppreſſion odious and intolerable? Is this a way of proceeding now, after the example of Bacchus?

Or what ſhall we ſay in the next place to the indefatigable Hercules? his publick-ſpirited labours and bold adventures, wholeſome laws, righteous judgments, plenty both at ſea and land, and all to eſtabliſh peace and commerce over the face of the univerſe? This is a ſhort character of Hercules, and let us now compare the copy with the original, and ſee what a picture we have gotten of that hero in Caius. A dull, ſlothful, wretched mortal, and ſo far from brave, that he's as timorous as a hare: nothing of order, quiet, or comfort, but on the contrary, ſedition, miſery, and tumult, where-ever he comes. And this Caius ſetting up at laſt for a demi-god in imitation of Hercules.

Now ſpeak, Caius, is it for thy butchery and tyranny, that thou hopeſt to be made a God? or is it thy ſpite to mankind, to conſider, that being immortal thyſelf, all the plagues thou haſt brought upon the world muſt be likewiſe everlaſting? Now I am of another opinion, and that if thou wert already upon the very liſt for a God, the lewdneſs of thy life would bring thee down again, into a ſtate of mortality; for if virtue can make a God, wickedneſs conſequently will degrade him. It is not for the murderer of his brother to take ſanctuary under the protection of the moſt illuſtrious friendſhip betwixt two brothers that ever was heard of; neither is it for any man to entitle himſelf to the merits of Hercules and Bacchus, that lives in a contradiction to their principles of honour and virtue.

CHAP. VII.

Caius grows worſe and worſe; and ſets up for a god of a ſuperior order.

THE madneſs of Caius was by this time advanced to ſo extravagant a pitch, that a demi-god's place would not now content him, without entring into a competition with the gods of the firſt rate; as Apollo, Mars, and Mercury. He began with Mercury, and ſo dreſs'd himſelf up in all the ornaments and enſigns of his dignity, as the mantle, the white rod, the wings and buskins; valuing himſelf all this while upon order, in confuſion itſelf, and reaſon in the head of a man whoſe brain was diſtemper'd with the phrenſy. When he was weary of being Mercury, he laid aſide that maſquerade, and perſonated Apollo, with a radiant crown upon his head, a bow and arrows in his left hand, and the graces held forth inhis right; intimating, that we ſhould be forward and ready to do good offices, but backward and ſlow to puniſh.

After this, there were holy ſongs and dances exhibited to this new god; though well enough ſatisfied but a little before in the perſon of Bacchus, with the appellations of Liber, Evius and Lyceus. He would then again, by fits, be aſſuming the perſon of Mars, accouter'd with a coſtly head-piece, ſword and buckler; taking his march, with his prieſts and bravoes on each hand of him, and ſo act Mars himſelf to the life, in the execution of his blood-thirſty cruelties. This horrid ſpectacle ſtruck an aſtoniſhing terror into all that beheld it; to ſee a counterfeit uſurp upon the honours of theſe heroes, though a perfect enemy to their virtue, and reſembling them in nothing but their habits, which have no further meaning than as intimations of the bounty and goodneſs of the gods to thoſe that truly love and fear them. And what's the moral now of Mercury's winged buskins, but that being the meſſenger or embaſſadour of the gods, as the Greek word imports, and the bearer of good tidings, (as no wiſe man, much leſs a God, would undertake to be the author of ill news) 'tis fit he ſhould be quick in his diſpatches, where haſte is ſo requiſite? And what again does his wand or white rod ſignify, but the enſign of a league or a peace-maker? For 'tis the herald that puts an end to the war either by agreement or truce; and without the mediation of this good office we ſhould be continually deſtroying one another without either end or meaſure. But what did Caius's wings ſerve him for, ſaving only to publiſh the execrable lewdneſs of his life and manners over the face of the whole earth; ſcandal that on the contrary ſhould rather have been bury'd in ſilence? Neither was there any occaſion for the figure of a ſpeedy paſſage, to a wretch that might have ſtood ſtill in the ſame place, and like an inexhauſtible fountain have laid the world under water. And what uſe had he again for the figure of a wand, the emblem of peace, that was never the author of one temperate word or action? For there was nothing where he had to do, whether among Greeks or Barbarians, in private houſes or in cities, but civil wars, heart-burnings, and ſedition: wherefore our imaginary and counterfeit Mercury ſhould do well to quit a name and a pretence he has ſo little colour of a title to.

Neither is he, in the complexion of his mind, one jot liker Apollo than he was to Mercury. He wears a ſparkling crown, 'tis true, with the beams of the ſun artificially wrought upon it; but what's the ſun to deeds that would not bear the light? An honeſt and a virtuous action cannot have too many eyes to look upon it, no not the ſun itſelf in his meridian glory, when it ſhines the brighteſt. But for foul, impious, and diſhonourable practices, that will not ſtand the teſt, as they were works of darkneſs, in the very conſcience of them, ſo let them remain condemn'd to the regions of darkneſs, and never ſee the light. But let him change hands now, and take the bow and the arrows in his right hand, and deſtroy men, women and children, cities and families, according to his cuſtom, and then let him conceal the graces in his left hand, unleſs he had rather throw them away: for he is evidently guiltly of horrible oppreſſions, out of an immoderate love of money: and then follow his rapines, with the murder of the proprietors; by which means he turns the very bounties of providence into a ſnare, by make it a crime to be wealthy. And it is much the ſame caſe with our mock Apollo in the matter of phyſick; who inſtead of being the inventor of ſalutary remedies, and of a benevolent readineſs to aſſiſt people, either in the preventing or in the curing of diſeaſes, infects the ſound, makes cripples, of men even in perfect health, diſpatches men before their time, and enter'd ſo far into the art of poiſoning, that if divine juſtice had not given him a check in the courſe of his wickedneſs, there would hardly have been one honeſt or ſubſtantial man left, eſpecially in Italy and other populous places; for there was more gold and ſilver hoarded up in that compaſs of ground than in the whole world beſide. But he began at home, and ſhew'd himſelf the ſcourge, the plague, and the ruin of the people. Apollo was as famous alſo for his predictions as for his phyſick; but all ſtill for the good of mankind: for when people were in the dark and doubtful, and in danger of taking good for evil, he never fail'd with his oracles to ſet them right, and to keep them from wavering: nay, his fore-knowledge of the future was ſo certain, that men believ'd it as if they had ſeen it with their eyes. But what if we ſhould compare the doughty oracles of Caius now with thoſe of Apollo? his prognoſticks of infamy, confiſcations, exiles and executions, to all men of quality and merit? Where's the affinity betwixt our new Apollo and the other, that never did the like? Wherefore let us have no more mock ſongs of joy and triumph, to the tune of true ones; for if the counterfeiting of a prince's image upon his coin be reckon'd a crime, a falſe worſhip is worſe certainly by much than falſe money.

But the greateſt ſurprize of all reſt, is the taking upon him to perſonate the ſtrength and bravery of Mars, with a broken conſtitution that has not the ſoul in it of a woman, and then making no more difficulty of putting the cheat upon the ſpectators, than as if it were but a ſcene of a play upon a ſtage. But without deſcending to particulars in our compariſon, take them body and mind together, and no two things can be more unlike. I do not ſpeak of the fabulous, or the phantome Mars; but of the other; by which we underſtand the force of a natural courage in the protection of the innocent, and for the relief of the oppreſſed, according to the derivation of the Greek word, Ἄρης from ἀρήγειν, to help. Mars, in fine, has two names; one of them a lover of peace, ſo far as it conduces to the good of the publick; and the other, as much a friend to war, that is ſure to be attended with blood and confuſion.

CHAP. VIII.

Caius's rage againſt the Jews, for refuſing to pay him divine honour.

Here's enough ſaid to ſhew, that Caius had no pretence to liſt himſelf upon the roll of the gods; no, not ſo much as upon that of the demi-gods: for there was no ſort of agreement betwixt them, either in their nature, or in their eſſence; or more particularly, in their inclinations and manners. Men are blinded with their luſts, eſpecially when they are ſeconded by ambition, obſtinacy, the love of contention, and the licentious impotency of unbridled appetites. But men do not know when they are well, and this was our ruin. Now Caius had nothing under the cope of heaven to fear, but the Jews, to croſs him in his deſign; being a people train'd up from their cradle under the care of parents, tutors, and maſters, the doctrine of holy writ, and the law of nature, to the belief only of one God, the father and creator of the world. I ſpeak this of the Jews; for as to the reſt, men and women, cities, nations, countries, provinces, I might have ſaid, well nigh the whole univerſe, verſe, how much ſoever againſt their inclinations, did nevertheleſs join with the faction, extoll'd Caius to the skies, and conſequently gave a kind of ſanction to his pride and vanity.

NAY there were certain Romans, that deſcended ſo low, as to introduce the barbarous way of worſhip into Italy itſelf, to the ſcandal of their liberties. But the Jews, I ſay, were the only nation from whom they apprehended any oppoſition; a people, that rather than part with the leaſt ſcruple of their country's rights, would embrace death as cheerfully, as if it were but entering into a ſtate of immortality: for 'tis in this caſe as it is in buildings; take out one ſtone, and tho' the reſt may ſeem to ſtand firm at preſent, time will weaken it by degrees, till it falls all to pieces. And the point in queſtion was no trifle neither; but a matter, on the contrary, of the higheſt importance imaginable; and no leſs than the transforming of fleſh and blood into a deity, and turning a mortal man into an immortal god. A moſt execrable blaſphemy; and the notion would have been more tolerable, if it had been the turning of a god into a man, than of a man into a god. Beſide the gap that it would open into all manner of wickedneſs, as infidelity and ingratitude to the author of all mercies and bounties, in the diſtribution of his bleſſings and graces to the common good and comfort of mankind.

THIS was it that involv'd our nation in ſo deſtructive and mercileſs a war. For what greater miſery can befal a ſervant, than to lie under the mortal hatred of his maſter? Now the ſubjects of emperors are ſervants; but how eaſily ſoever they liv'd under former emperors, the government of Caius made their condition inſupportable: a prince without any bowels of humanity or compaſſion; one that knew no other law but his own will, and abrogated all other proviſions as ſuperfluous. But ſtill of all other people under the ſun, ours were certainly the moſt deſpicable of ſlaves and drudges, under the arbitrary rigour of a tyrannical monſter, inſtead of a father of his people.

CHAP. IX.

THE Alexandrians no ſooner came to underſtand the malicious intentions of Caius againſt the Jews, but the populace immediately laid hold of the occaſion to revenge themſelves upon them, for an old grudge, and ſo enter'd into a conſpiracy to put all in a tumult. The work went on ſo unanimouſly, that it look'd as if the emperor himſelf had been a party to the uproar, or that we had been all priſoners at mercy: ſo brutal and bloody was the execution they did upon us; breaking open of houſes, turning man, woman, and child out of doors, and then rifling and carrying away all they could lay their hands on that was valuable. And this not done under any awe neither, or in the dark, like common night-thieves, that are afraid of being taken up and brought to juſtice; but they committed theſe robberies in the very face of the ſun, ſhewing what they had gotten to every body they met, with as much confidence as if it had been an inheritance or a purchaſe. Nay, they had companies and ſocieties among themſelves, that went ſharers in the booty, dividing the ſpoil, even in the market-place, and the proprietors themſelves, as it fell out ſometimes, looking on, whom they mock'd and vilify'd with ſcorns and virulent railings over and above.

THIS was a hard caſe, at leaſt, if it may paſs for one, to have men of quality and eſtates turn'd out of all in a moment, and made beggars without ſo much as knowing their fault. But ſo it was, that they were forc'd from their habitations, and expos'd like vagabonds to the wide world, to periſh with heat or ſtarve with cold, no proviſions being allow'd them to ſupport life. And this was all nothing yet, to that which follow'd. For after the cooping up of ſo many thouſands of men, women, and children, in a narrow place, like beaſts in a pound, without the neceſſaries of life, they made no doubt of finding them in a few days a pile of carcaſſes, for want either of food or of breath; the place being cloſe and ſmothering, and the air corrupted with malignant vapours from the vitiated lungs of a confus'd crowd of people: which in this caſe is but adding fire to fire. Now the body is hot in itſelf, and that heat requires a refreſhing air from without to aſſiſt reſpiration; but hot upon hot puts all out of order.

SUCH, in fine, were the difficulties of this place, that there was no longer any living in it for want of air; ſo that the poor people were forc'd abroad in this extremity: ſome withdrew toward the ſea-ſide, others betook themſelves to ſome remote burying places; ſome one way, ſome another, and all gaſping for breath. As for thoſe that ſtay'd behind, in any other part of the city, or came into it afterward during this outrage, without knowing any thing of the matter, theſe miſerable wretches were batter'd with tiles and brickbats, their limbs broken, and their brains beaten out with cudgels, and thoſe parts of the body principally aim'd at, where the wound or the bruiſe was moſt likely to be mortal. And it far'd not much better with thoſe neither, who were coop'd up, as I ſaid, in that narrow corner of the city, where they were beſet with ſpies, in caſe any of them ſhould venture upon an eſcape; which was reaſonably to be expected, not ſo much for their own ſakes, as to ſave their families from periſhing by hunger. The Alexandrians kept a ſtrict guard upon that quarter; and ſo many as they found attempting to get away, they put them firſt to the torture, and then to death; and no cruelty was thought too much for them. There was another body of theſe brutes that planted themſelves upon the river ſide, to lie in wait there for the Jewiſh merchants, and their effects, which they took away in ſight of the owners, and then burnt them alive; making uſe of the cabins, oars, and tember veſſel for the fuel. Others were burnt in the middle of the city, and in a way much more terrible; for they made uſe of the bruſh-wood inſtead of billets, and when they had kindled it, they threw the miſerable wretches into the fire; but the branches being moiſt and green, the ſmoke was ſtronger than the flame, and left no coals behind.

There

There were ſeveral drawn alive too, with ropes and cords, through the ſtreets, and croſs the market-place; the multitude inſulting over their bodies even when they were dead: for after the quartering, and cutting of them piece-meal, they trampled them under foot, and with more than brutal cruelty would not let one bit of them appear to intitle them to a burial.

Now the governor of the province, who might with eaſe have put a ſtop to the courſe of this popular fury, if he had had a mind to it: this governor, I ſay, pretended a downright ignorance all this while of the very things he ſaw and heard, which was as good as a commiſſion to them in what they did, and an encouragement to worſe. There were meeting houſes, or places of prayer, up and down the city in abundance; and there it was, that the people in vaſt bodies diſcharg'd their fury next: in ſome places by grubbing up their groves and trees; in others, they demoliſh'd the houſes from top to bottom: in ſome again, they committed all to the flames; but in ſuch a tranſport of rage and madneſs, that the fire took the adjoining buildings; as 'tis hard putting a ſtop to a conflagration where there's combuſtible matter to work upon: to ſay nothing of the monumental and illuſtrious memorials, that were ſet up by ſeveral of the Roman emperors, in honour of the Jews, and were all conſum'd at the ſame time; as bucklers, crowns, and garlands, gilt ſtatues, with their titles and inſcriptions, &c. which all people had a veneration for. But the faction was at that time ſtark mad.

And now to fortify themſelves yet more in the prince's favour, and to ſecure Caius likewiſe, all that was poſſible, in the execution of his bloody deſigns, they apply'd themſelves to new arts of flattery and inſinuation, and this was the way they went to work.

There were a great many oratories, where the Jews would have been too ſtrong for the rioters if it had come to a ſcuffle; and theſe they durſt not venture on, either to burn, or to pull down; ſo that they bethought themſelves of another way of proceeding, and how they might deſtroy their worſhip and their manners both in one; that is to ſay, they erected Caius's ſtatue in all the meeting-places that they could not demoliſh; and in the chief of them, a chariot with four horſes of braſs; an invention that ſeveral officious zealots were ſo fond of, as for want of others, to make uſe of old ruſty jades, without either ears, tails, or legs; being taken out of the Gymnaſium, or place of exerciſe, and, as they ſay, dedicated of old to Cleopatra, the great grandmother of the laſt queen of that name. Now whether this was well or ill done, let any mortal judge: I mean the dedication of that to an emperor, that had been firſt dedicated to a woman: beſides that it was old, and out of faſhion over and above, and in that reſpect below the acceptance of an imperial patron: how ſhould they imagine, that a vain, a haughty, and a violent prince, ſhould ever be pleas'd with any thing ſo like a mockery, under the cover of a reverential reſpect! And yet they had the face to value themſelves upon the merit of what they had done, and to expect a reward for it. But the ſervice they laid the greateſt ſtreſs upon, was the turning of ſo many oratories into new temples, and encreaſing the number of them; wherein nothing can be more certain than that they did not ſo much conſult the honour of their maſter, as the gratifying of their own paſſions, in wreaking their ſpite all manner of ways upon the Jews. As for example: there were a matter of ten kings, in the ſpace of three hundred years, and not ſo much as one image or ſtatue conſecrated to any of them; notwithſtanding that they treated them at the ſame time, in the ſtile and title of gods. 'Tis true they knew them to be but men all this while, when they made gods of them. And why not a god of a man, as well as a god of a ſerpent, a crocodile, a bird, a beaſt, a fiſh, and the like? as we find in the Egyptian temples, altars, and groves, that are conſecrated to the honour of thoſe creatures.

But as theſe people are the groſſeſt flatterers under the ſun, and court princes for their fortunes, rather than for their perſons and virtues, they will be anſwering perhaps, that as the emperors are greater, and more conſiderable than the Ptolemies, ſo 'tis but reaſonable they ſhould have more honour done them than the other. A moſt ridiculous pretence! For at that rate, why had not Octavianus * the ſame honours done him before Caius, to whom Caius ſtood indebted for the empire: a prince, that after a reign of three and forty * years, both at ſea and land, did not leave ſo much as the leaſt ſpark or proſpect of a war, either in Greece or Barbary, but lived in the conſtant poſſeſſion of peace, and in the enjoyment of the bleſſings of it to his dying day. And yet this prince after all had none of theſe honours done him. Was it for want of blood and family, to entitle him to this preferment? No, no; there was no defect that way, for he was much ſuperior to Caius both by father and mother. Or can it be ſaid that he was inferior to him in learning, and leſs skill'd in the rules and arts of government? No man of his time certainly made a truer judgment of things, or diſcourſed matters better. And for his years then, never any prince or emperor had the reputation of being wiſe ſooner, or of growing old more to his honour: inſomuch, that he was celebrated for the early pregnancy of his underſtanding, by the diſtinguiſhing character of the old young prince.

And yet this incomparable prince muſt be paſſed over, to make way for Caius; a prince, that by his virtue, has in a manner ſurmounted the very frailties of human nature, and intitled himſelf by the bravery, conduct, and juſtice of his adminiſtration, to the venerable name of Auguſtus: not as an hereditary honour tranſmitted to him from his anceſtors, but a glo-

* Though the original in this place ſays three and twenty years, and ſpeaks of Tiberius, and not of Octavianus, yet 'tis plain, not only from all the ſeveral circumſtances that follow, but alſo more expreſly from the laſt paragraph of this chapter, that the text is corrupted in both places, and that the exalted encomiums here given could not belong to Tiberius, but to Octavianus Ceſar Auguſtus; for which reaſon we have corrected the text by changing the names and number of years according to authentic Roman hiſtory.

The whole world was in a flame, both at ſea and land, when this mighty prince came to the government. The quarrel in ſhort was empire; the maritime, and the inland provinces engaged in it under the command of the braveſt men among the Romans, party againſt party, and the greateſt part of the world concerned in the diſpute; nation againſt nation, and people againſt people, to the degree of endangering a total devaſtation, in the conſequences of ſo bloody a conteſt: for not only the happineſs, but the very being of mankind was at ſtake upon the iſſue, if providence, in the critical nick of this juncture, when their hearts were ready to ſink under the burden, had not raiſed up a prince of an illuſtrious family, like a guardian angel to their deliverance. And this prince was that Ceſar, that by charming the winds and the waves, and laying the ſtorm, ſettled the whole race of mankind in an univerſal peace: the prince that brought a remedy for all ſores, that had ſpread themſelves eaſt, weſt, north, and ſouth, through all quarters: this was he, that in his own ſingle perſon, ſet all the provinces at liberty, and put an end both to wars and robberies; and when he had cleared the ſeas of pirates, he repleniſhed them again with veſſels of trade and commerce, and brought order out of confuſion; reducing the moſt barbarous and inhoſpitable of nations, to a temper of ſociety and good-nature, and making all the towns as eaſy as if they had been perfectly free. He maintained peace, and adminiſter'd juſtice, and ſcatter'd his bounties and good graces among the people, in ſo generous a way of profuſion, that they wanted for nothing: and this was his courſe and practice to the end of his days. And yet after all theſe obligations, to ſo great and glorious a benefactor, and the three and forty years government of Egypt over and above, there was no talk of ſtatues, or images, to his honour in any of their oratories. But yet if any mortal could pretend a title to a reſpect ſo new and extraordinary, this prince of all men living had certainly the faireſt right to it: not only, as the author of the auguſt imperial family, and the beſt deſerving from all mankind; but for taking the power out of many hands into one, and aſſuming the care of it to himſelf, as a prince perfectly skilled in the art of government. It was well ſaid, that, "ſovereignty is not to be divided," for many voices are the cauſe of many miſchiefs. And this is not all neither, for the whole world had decreed him divine honours, as temples, groves, porticos, and ſuch pieces of curioſity and ſtate, that new or old, ancient or modern, the world does not afford the like: eſpecially that temple of Ceſar's in Alexandria, under the name of Sebaſte, a piece incomparably above all others. It ſtands ſituate over againſt a moſt commodious harbour; wonderful high, and large in proportion, and an eminent ſea-mark; full of choice paintings and ſtatues, with donatives and oblations in abundance; and then it is beautified all over with gold and ſilver; the model curious, and regular in the diſpoſition of the parts, as galleries, libraries, porches, courts, halls, walks, and conſecrated groves, as glorious as expence and art could make them, and every thing in the proper place: beſide that, the hope and comfort of ſea-faring men either coming in or going out. Shall any man think now that in ſuch a caſe as this, and in ſo univerſal a conſent and concourſe of nations, any thing was wanting, that was juſtly due to the honour of Ceſar, without ſetting up the ſtatues in the Jews oratories. No man in his right wits can ſay there was. But why was it omitted then? Hear, and I'll tell you.

They underſtood the generoſity and juſtice of Ceſar ſo well, that they knew he would be as tender of the rights and privileges of the ſeveral provinces, as of the ceremonies of Rome itſelf: but he did not think fit however to reject the good-will of his blind flatterers; not that he approved of the thing, but the dignity of the empire required it, as an artificial way of creating a veneration for the government. Neither was he one jot puffed up with the complimental offers, as it appears by this, that he would never ſuffer himſelf to be treated in the ſtile of God or maſter; ſo great an averſion he had to ſo ſervile a way of adulation. Nay he would not ſtick to declare himſelf well ſatisfied with the Jews refuſal to comply with this abominable practice: he would never elſe have ſuffered ſo conſiderable a part of the city beyond Tyber, to continue in the poſſeſſion of the Jews, the greater part of them being freemen too, that is to ſay, men that having been priſoners of war, were ſet at liberty by their maſters, to live according to the laws of their country and profeſſion. He was no ſtranger to the nature of their oratories, and their worſhip there on the ſabbath-days, eſpecially, according to the practice of their fore-fathers. He knew well enough too of the collections they made, and the ſending of them up to Jeruſalem, under the name of firſt fruits; and of miniſters they had to offer ſacrifice for them; and yet he neither turned them out of the city, nor inflicted any other puniſhment upon them, as he might have done. Nay, and in Paleſtine itſelf, the Jews were allowed the liberty of their country's worſhip, without putting any check or reſtraint upon them, either in the matter of their oratories, or in the freedom of their legiſlative aſſemblies. Neither did he ſhew any diſlike to the ſolemn cuſtom of offering up of firſt fruits; but on the contrary, he had ſo great a reverence for our holy worſhip, that we have the preſents yet to ſhew, of almoſt all his domeſticks, in that temple of ours, in token of his approbation: beſide his expreſs order for the offering up of daily ſacrifices to the moſt high God, at his own charge; which cuſtom is in practice to this day, and will continue ſo for ever as a monument to the everlaſting honour of this pious emperor. And then upon any occaſion of a monthly diſtribution of money and corn to be made among the people, he took care that the Jews might have their proportion of the charity: or if the day for the diſpoſing of it happened to fall out upon the Jews ſabbath, when our people were not allowed either to give or take, or to do any ſort of work, eſpecially for profit, the officers were commanded to reſerve their ſhare apart for them till the next day. This generous tenderneſs gave the Jews ſo great a reputation in the world, that it kept their very enemies in awe, from breaking in upon the ſacredneſs of their privileges.

THE Jews were as eaſy alſo under Tiberius, as under Auguſtus, though Sejanus did what he could to irritate him againſt them, and to embroil Italy in new troubles. Now Tiberius quickly found, after the miſerable death of Sejanus, that the ſtories he had told him were only calumny and malice, and that Sejanus's buſineſs was only to clear the city of the Jews, as the men the moſt likely of all others to oppoſe his impious deſign upon the life of the emperor; who, upon this, ſent orders immediately to all the governors of provinces, to be kind to the Jews wherever they found them, ſome very few excepted: but for preſſing any innovations upon them in matters of worſhip, that was not to be endured; for he looked upon them to be a peaceable, and a good ſort of people, and found nothing in their laws, lives, and manners, but what was very agreeable to the meaſures of a well ordered government.

CHAP. X.

CAIUS was now ſo puffed up with pride and vanity, that he really took himſelf for the god he pretended to be: and no people ſo forward, either Greeks or Barbarians, to countenance the phrenſy, as theſe Alexandrians; who are certainly the moſt artificial diſſemblers, flatterers, and hypocrites, under the cope of heaven. They have ſmooth tongues, words at will, and the beſt qualified men in nature for the overturning of a ſtate and laying all in confuſion. He that would be well informed of the veneration that theſe religious people have for the dreadful name of God, needs but conſider that they treat their * Ibes, their † Aſps, and ſeveral other animals in the ſame ſtile, whereby men are eaſily impoſed upon, that are not well aware of the horrid impiety of the Egyptians; but for thoſe that underſtand the humour and genius of the people, and make a right judgment of things, they lie as open to them as the day. Now Caius was ſo beſotted, as to think that the Alexandrians believed him to be a god in good earneſt: for they acted their part ſo well, that there was no difference in appearance betwixt a falſe worſhip and a true; the acclamations, and the external formalities, being the very ſame. This groſs miſtake made him reflect upon all the extravagances of a ſacrilegious zeal, together with the late affronts upon the oratories in particular, as an impulſe of conſcience and affection. He had an account ſent him daily from Alexandria of theſe tranſactions, which he read with more pleaſure and delight than any poem or hiſtory: nor any intelligencers ſo fit for his turn, as his own domeſticks, to gratify the humour of their maſter in what he lik'd or diſlik'd. The greater part of them were Egyptians; an abject, vile ſort of people, train'd up in the worſhip of ſerpents and crocodiles, and corrupted body and ſoul. The head of this abominable troop was one Helico, a mean and a wicked wretch, that by lewd arts had wrought himſelf into the court. He had ſome tincture of learning, that he got under his firſt maſter, whoſe ſlave he was, and who afterwards made a preſent of him to Tiberius Ceſar. But that prince's genius leading him to what was grave and ſerious, and Helico's talent lying altogether upon the buffoon, he took no pleaſure in him at all. Nay, on the contrary, he had a natural averſion, even in his youth, for all things that were trivial and light. But upon Tiberius's deceaſe, and Caius's ſucceeding to the empire, Helico conſidered with himſelf, that he had now another game to play with his new maſter, who he ſaw was a prince wholly abandoned to all manner of vitious licence.

"WELL, (ſays Helico to himſelf) the happy hour is now at hand, wherefore rouze, and beſtir thyſelf; thou haſt a maſter to thy very heart's wiſh, and thou haſt that maſter to thyſelf at pleaſure: thou haſt a turn of wit agreeable enough, and a faculty of droll and banter, no man better; to ſay nothing of pleaſant conceits, mirth, jokes, and raillery, peculiar to thyſelf. Thou art equally the maſter of arts, liberal and illiberal. Thy tongue is well enough hung too, to cut a hair betwixt ſatire and flattery; eſpecially when thou haſt a prince in thy power that takes delight in calumny and reproach: for his ears are always open, thou knoweſt, to ſlander and obloquy: and then never trouble thy head to look farther for matter, ſo long as thou haſt the Jews laws and ceremonies to work upon: and this is a point of skill that thou haſt been inſtructed in from thy very cradle; not from any one maſter, but from the clamorous and noiſy part of the Alexandrian rabble. This is the caſe; and now let us ſee what thou art the better for thy learning."

HELICO's head was ſo full of this capricious whimſy, that he ply'd Caius night and day; breaking in upon him ſtill in the very privacy of his receſſes, entertaining him with ſquinting double-edged ſtories, betwixt jeſt and earneſt, and the ſharper the pleaſanter. But his way was not to play the informer barefaced, or to own himſelf for what he was; but he did the Jews more miſchief by oblique innuendoes, and under the diſguiſe of an alluſion, than he could have done in the quality of a profeſſed enemy.

WHEN the Alexandrian ambaſſadors came to underſtand the management of this intrigue, they made it their buſineſs to bring Helico over into their intereſt; ſome ſay, by great ſums of money in hand, or at leaſt by large promiſes, both of treaſure and of honour, ſo ſoon as Caius ſhould come to Alexandria. Helico's head was mightily affected with the vanity of thinking what reſpects he was to receive in the preſence, not only of his maſter, but of ſo many eminent perſons as would be ſure to appear from all quarters upon ſo ſolemn an occaſion,

* The Ibis was an Egyptian bird, very high, with ſtiff legs and a long bill, that eat up the ſerpents that infeſted the country. See Plin. viii. 27. Authors make frequent mention of the Egyptians worſhipping this bird.

† The Aſp was a moſt venomous ſerpent, worſhipp'd alſo by the Egyptians.

and in veneration to ſo great a prince. So that Helico promis'd great matters in the concluſion.

We had been hitherto ſo taken up with the thought of our known and open enemies, that we never ſo much as dreamt of the danger of a ſecret one, in the perſon of Helico. But when we came to find our miſtake, we made a trial to work upon him by flattery and fair words, as the man of the whole world we had the moſt reaſon to dread; for he attended Caius at all his exerciſes, liberties and entertainments; as balls, wreſtling, bathing, feaſting, beſide all manner of ſenſual pleaſures. And which is more than all the reſt, he was the firſt gentleman of the bed-chamber, ſo that upon all occaſions he was ſure of the emperor's ear. His diſcourſes turn'd all upon ſcurrility and buffoonery, and yet were ſo temper'd betwixt ſweet and ſour, that they were at the ſame time the ſharpeſt, and the moſt agreeable mixture that could be imagin'd; it being his principal deſign to pleaſe Caius, and at the ſame time to ruin us by ſcandal and ſubornations; though the former fell in only by the bye, yet the other was in truth his principal deſign and main buſineſs. But in the end, out comes ſuch a concatenation of ſtories ſo artificially link'd together, and improv'd with ſuch aggravations, that the impreſſion they made upon the prince was never to be forgotten or defac'd.

CHAP. XI.

The Jews of Alexandria ſend deputies to Caius, with an account of their grievances, and Philo the chief of their embaſſy.

WHEN we had done all that was poſſible toward cultivating a better underſtanding with Helico, and found him ſo intolerably proud and inacceſſible, that there was no ſpeaking to him, we let that project fall, and bethought ourſelves of another expedient, which ſeem'd no leſs neceſſary, and yet more likely to take effect; not knowing all this while, but it might be ſome perſonal and particular pique againſt the Jews, that made him ſo exaſperated againſt us. Now the courſe we took was this: It was thought reaſonable to preſent Caius with a petition, in the nature of a remonſtrance of all our grievances, and a prayer for relief. This petition was, in truth, but the abſtract of a longer addreſs, that was deliver'd a little before to king Agrippa, when he call'd at Alexandria in his way to Syria, to take poſſeſſion of a government the emperor had confer'd upon him. We were thus far advanced in our way toward Rome, under a great miſtake it ſeems; for whereas we made no doubt of finding Caius a prince of honour and juſtice, he prov'd, on the contrary, the moſt implacable enemy we had to do withal; but with the words and countenance, and under the mask ſtill, of a generous friend. It was in the field of Mars; (a field near Tyber) that he ſaluted and received us, and ſo he gave us to underſtand by a ſign of his right hand, that we were heartily welcome: he ſent Homulus alſo, the introducer of ambaſſadors, to tell us, he would take cognizance of our cauſe at leiſure: which made all people conclude, both Jews and ſtrangers, that our buſineſs was as good as done. But wiſdom and experience taught me better things, than to judge by appearances, and ſo that which pleas'd the reſt of the company troubled me, and gave me a jealouſy upon the main; whereupon I reaſoned the matter thus with myſelf: "Here are ambaſſadors from all parts of the "world; and what's the meaning of it, that "the Jews are only to be heard; beſide that "they are known to be Jews, and a people that "will content themſelves to ſtand upon the "ſame level with the reſt. But for us, in fine, "to expect a privilege from a ſtranger, a young "and a free prince, would be next door to "madneſs. He is partial to the Alexandrians "without diſpute, and it is for their ſakes, "that he preſſes the matter to an iſſue. I "ſhould be glad to ſee him an indifferent arbitrator betwixt party and party, but I "dread the thought of finding him an advocate for them, and an enemy to us."

CHAP. XII.

Caius orders Petronius, the governor of Syria, to ſet up his ſtatue in the temple of Jeruſalem: Philo and his collegues are inform'd of it.

THESE thoughts kept me waking, and in this anxiety I was ſurpriz'd with a diſmal accident not to be foreſeen, and an accident that boded deſtruction to the whole nation of the Jews. There was no importuning of Caius in the matter, and ſo we only follow'd him out of town to Puteoli, whither he went to take the air at the ſea-ſide, and to divert himſelf from place to place, in the ſight of goodly towns and palaces, which are thereabouts in abundance. While we were waiting there in daily expectation of an audience, and highly ſolicitous what would become of our cauſe, up comes a man to us trembling, and out of breath, with his eyes blood-ſhotten; and after ſtanding a while at gaze, he withdrew a little out of hearing, for there was company by. "And hark ye, ſays he ſoft"ly, do you hear any news?" And as he was going to tell ſomething, he guſh'd out into tears that put a ſtop to his ſpeech. He offer'd at it again and again, but ſtill was not able to expreſs himſelf. But ſeeing him at laſt ſo frightful a ſpectacle, we beſought him to tell us what he came thither for, unleſs he came purely for crying ſake; but if there was any mournful matter of moment that was worth communicating, we begg'd to partake of it, for mourning was our daily exerciſe: but in the end, after many a ſigh and ſob, "Our tem"ple, ſays he, is utterly ruin'd; for Caius "has commanded his image to be ſet up in "the ſanctuary, with Jupiter's name upon it." This dreadful news ſtruck us all ſenſeleſs that heard it; and the truth of it was quickly confirm'd by ſeveral others. Upon this, we all withdrew together into a cloſet, where we ſhut up ourſelves, and there condol'd our misfortunes publick and private; as grief is talkative, and will never want matter to work upon.

LITTLE did we think, when we committed ourſelves to the hazards of raging ſeas, and a tedious winter voyage, to deliver us from our perſecuting oppreſſors; little did we think, I ſay, of a ſtorm at land, and that the moſt diſmal part of our calamity was yet to come: for winter blaſts are but according to the courſe of nature, in the diſtinguiſhing of the ſeaſons; and the works of nature are but in other terms the operations of providence, in order to the common good of mankind. But the author of this tempeſt is perfectly devoid both of humanity and prudence, a turbulent and an ambitious young man, and ſo much the more dangerous, for having the power of the whole empire to ſupport him. For who ſhould dare to intercede in caſe of need, or but ſo much as open his mouth upon the temple's behalf, to the moſt ſacrilegious enemy of all men living? for it would be againſt common ſenſe, to expect mercy out of cruelty; and to depoſite the hopes of our preſervation in the hands of our perſecutors. A temple as venerable all over the world as the ſun in the firmament; and we may be ſure, that he that refuſes to ſpare that temple will ſpare nothing!

"WELL! and why ſhould not we die then? "eſpecially when he that lays down one life "for the laws and religion of his country, is "ſure of a life more glorious in exchange. "But he muſt be a madman at laſt however, "that caſts away a life at this rate, which no "body is the better for. So that ſuch an in"ſtance as this would but be the addition of "one more to the roll of our former calami"ties: eſpecially we being here under the "character of embaſſador, and in a point "where the principals are more concern'd than "the deputies. Nay, we ſhall not want en"vious and malignant ſpirits over and above, "and of our own people too, to make the worſt "of things, and to impute any glorious reſo"lution to a wrong cauſe. The embaſſadors, "they'll ſay, were men of unſound princi"ples, who quitted their ſtation, and deſerted "the common-wealth, when they found it in "danger, in order to the promoting of their "own private intereſt. But the leſs muſt give "way to the greater; private matters to pub"lick; and wherever this order is broken or "confounded, the whole government is at "ſtake and out of frame; and in one word, "where the polity of the Jews comes once to "be ſubjected to the queſtion, 'tis a ſtep to"ward the aboliſhing of the very name of the "nation, where there is an agreement of pow"er and malice in the doing of it. We can"not, in fine, abandon the Alexandrian Jews; "for the whole nation of the Jews is at ſtake "upon it, being falſe to ourſelves; and it is "to be fear'd, that this cruel oppreſſor will "extirpate us all from off the face of the earth. "It will be ſaid, perhaps, that if we can "make nothing of it either way, we are at "liberty to come off at laſt, in caſe of the "worſt. To which I anſwer; he that makes "ſuch a propoſition, has neither courage nor "ſcripture in him. Generous natures will "hope the beſt, and holy writ lays the foun"dation of that hope, to all thoſe that hearti"ly embrace the doctrine; and who knows "now at laſt, but this may be for a trial of "our conſtancy and virtue in the worſt of for"tunes? Adieu then to all worldly comforts "and ſupports: they are falſe and fickle, and "leave us when we have moſt need of them. "Adieu, I ſay, to vain confidences, and let "us caſt ourſelves in a firm and lively faith "upon the goodneſs of God; who hath ſo of"ten deliver'd us already, and will never for"ſake us." After this manner we comforted ourſelves, and one another, in all caſes of ſurprize, and in the hopes of better times.

WHEN we had gone thus far, after a ſhort pauſe, we apply'd ourſelves to the bearer of this diſmal news. "You do not conſider, we "told him, that what you have ſaid as yet, "is but as ſo many live coals thrown into "our ears as you have utter'd words; for you "have only told us matter of fact, which "ſignifies nothing to our ſatisfaction without "the reaſon of it, and without knowing what "it was tranſported the emperor into this hor"rid reſolution."

"WHY then, ſays the other, to tell you "that which every body knows, Caius has a "mind to paſs for a god; and looking upon "the Jews as the only people likely to oppoſe "him in his blaſphemous pretence, he re"ſolv'd, if poſſible, to remove that obſtacle "out of the way, toward the facilitating of "the work. And this could not be better "done, he thought, than by beginning with "a contempt and indignity upon the holy "temple, which was allow'd at all hands to "be the moſt glorious piece in the univerſe, "both for ornament, and a vaſt treaſure in "preſents and oblations, which had been ſo "many years a gathering, and which Caius, "in the concluſion, had the face and confi"dence to aſſume to himſelf. Beſide that he "was now further exaſperated by Capito the "queſtor; which Capito was alſo the receiver "of the tributes in Judea, and a fellow that "by his actions and oppreſſions, had made "himſelf odious to all the provinces. He "came thither poor, and when he had ſo en"rich'd himſelf by fraud and corruption, that "he was afraid of being call'd to an account "for it, he found it his beſt way to complain "firſt; and to prevent an accuſation with a "calumny, by the improvement of an oppor"tunity that lay fair for his purpoſe."

"JAMNIA is a city of Judea, wonderfully "populous, and the inhabitants all Jews; "ſome few ſtrangers excepted, that to our "coſt came thither out of the bordering coun"tries to make acquaintances, or, as we ſay, "to ſee faſhions: over and above that they "are always contriving ſome plot or other "againſt the laws and cuſtoms of the Jews. "So ſoon as ever theſe people came to under"ſtand the extravagant ambition of Caius af"ter divine honours, and his deadly malice "to the whole Jewiſh nation, matters being "now ripe for a plot, they preſently cauſed "an altar to be erected of clay wrought in"to bricks out of pure ſpite to the citizens: "for they knew well enough, that this vio"lation of our laws would prove the ground "of a quarrel, and ſo they found it: for the "Jews gather'd together preſently, and de"moliſh'd the altar; the other party applying "themſelves to Capito for redreſs. Now "Capito was the author and contriver of the "whole tragedy, and pleaſing himſelf to ſee "every thing ſucceed ſo to his wiſh, he ſent "an account of it immediately to Caius, with "inflaming aggravations to make the matter "look worſe than it was. This arrogant hot"headed prince, had no ſooner receiv'd the " intelligence, but he preſently gave order " for the erecting of a glorious Coloſſus in the " temple of Jeruſalem, in revenge of the brick " altar that was pull'd down in Jamnia; and " this was done by the counſel of his two " doughty adviſers, Helico, the court buf- " foon, and Apelles the tragedian; who from " a proſtitute in his youth, went over after- " wards to be an actor upon the ſtage; a ſort " of people that are look'd upon in their thea- " trical liberties to be the looſeſt and the moſt " ſhameleſs of all profeſſions. And theſe were " the men that Caius pitch'd upon to inſtruct " him in the arts of ſinging and raillery, with- " out ſo much as ever thinking of the duties " of juſtice, and the care of maintaining the " publick peace. Thus did Helico, like a " ſcorpion, attack the Jews with an Egyptian " venom, and Apelles at the ſame time as an " Aſcalonite, that is to ſay, as a member of a " nation that's never to be reconciled to the " bordering Jews."

EVERY word of this relation, with the very names of the perſons that were mention'd in it, went to the hearts of us; but the learned counſellors liv'd in a ſhort time after, to receive rewards according to their deſerts. Apelles was taken up, laid in chains, and put to exquiſite tortures, and ſo conſequently to a lingering death: and Helico was afterwards put to death by Claudius the ſucceſſor of Caius, for having been the author of evil counſels.

CHAP. XIII.

Petronius finds great difficulty to execute the order of Caius for erecting his ſtatue in the temple of Jeruſalem.

AND now came Caius's order for the conſecrating and erecting of his ſtatue; which was drawn with all the caution and exactneſs in the world to ſecure the execution of it. As particularly, Petronius, the governor of Syria, was expreſly commanded to draw out one half of the army that lay upon the river Euphrates, as a guard of defence againſt any inroads and incurſions of the eaſtern kings or nations; and with theſe troops he was to attend the ſtatue, not for the ſolemnity of the dedication, but for a terror to any that ſhould dare to oppoſe it. " Ah cruel prince! (ſays " Petronius to himſelf,) when thou thyſelf " knoweſt before-hand, that theſe people will " rather die a thouſand deaths, than ſubmit " to ſuch an impoſition. And then what ſig- " nifies the calling of an army, but in order " to the conſecrating of the villany, with the " blood of ſo many thouſands of innocents?"

PETRONIUS was miſerably divided within himſelf upon this commiſſion. There was danger in refuſing, danger in delaying, and danger again in the very offering to evade it: beſide the infinite difficulties on the other hand in caſe of a compliance; for he made no doubt at all of the Jews ſtanding out all extremities, at what hazard ſoever. All nations are tender and jealous of their privileges and cuſtoms, but the Jews above all others; they look upon their laws to be no leſs than divine oracles, and they are train'd up to the love and ſtudy of them, from their cradles. They bear them in their hearts, and the more they think of them, the greater reverence they have for them. They treat all their proſelytes with the privileges of free-citizens, and the veneration they have for the dignity of their profeſſion, is ſo ſacred, that they could rather part with any thing, than the leaſt ſcruple of their duty: counting none ſo worthy of the name of enemies as the contemners and perſecutors of their religion. But the high eſteem they have for their holy temple, ſurpaſſeth all the reſt: witneſs the law that makes it death without mercy, for any man to ſet foot within the ſanctuary; whereas the reſt is open indifferently to all of their own nation from what province ſoever they come.

THIS was a matter of ſo great importance, that Petronius conſider'd of it over and over again, without coming to a reſolution; but in concluſion he call'd a kind of a council upon the queſtion, and upon ſumming up all arguments and opinions the reſult was this. " That " there muſt be no innovations in matter of " religion: firſt, becauſe nature and equity " are both againſt it; and, ſecondly, for fear " of unhappy conſequences, not only from " God himſelf, but from the paſſions of vio- " lent and revengeful men." He took into conſideration alſo, the prodigious extent of this populous nation: a people not coop'd up in this or that quarter, like other men, but diſpers'd over the world, the iſlands as well as the continent. So that upon the computation, the Jews are reckon'd to be well-nigh as numerous as all the reſt. " Now, ſays Pe- " tronius, how far it may ſtand with the rea- " ſon of the caſe, to provoke ſo many my- " riads of men into one common confedera- " cy, may deſerve a farther conſideration; " for all theſe multitudes united into one " maſs, would be able to drive the whole " earth before them. To ſay nothing of the " vaſt numbers in Judea itſelf; a brave, hardy, " and a well-diſciplin'd ſort of people, that " had much rather undergo a generous death, " than out-live the laws and religion of their " country: how barbarous ſoever in the opi- " nion of their enemies, yet in truth and ef- " fect, moſt generous and noble."

THE governor had another jealouſy alſo, of the troops on the other ſide of the Euphrates; as Babylon, and ſeveral other provinces, that to his certain knowledge were in the intereſt of the Jews: " For, ſays he, they ſent their " yearly contributions of holy treaſure, as they " call it, up to the temple under the name of " firſt fruits, and they all came ſafe, though " the ways were very difficult and dangerous; " as what is it, that piety and reſolution will " not make eaſy? But the main difficulty is " yet behind; which is, that upon the firſt " tidings of this new dedication, they would " immediately take the field, march directly " up to them, beſet and ſurround them, and " then cut them to pieces."

WHEN Petronius had debated this affair a while in his mind, he paſs'd a ſhort reflection or two upon the temper and the character of his maſter. " The perſon, ſays he, under " whoſe command I am now to act, is a young " prince: his will is his law, and whether " it be juſt or not, right or wrong, 'tis equal- " ly dangerous to oppoſe, either the one or " the other, or to diſtinguiſh one from t'other, " but by this meaſure. If he ſays he's a god,

" who

" who ſhall dare to ſay the contrary? So that " in this caſe, 'tis as much as a man's life is " worth, either to obey, or not. The one
" way a man is liable to the chance of war;
" (which in truth is but doubtful:) and the " other way the diſobedience is certain
" death."

CHAP. XIV.

Petronius ſets people at work upon the ſtatue. The principals of the Jews refuſe to receive it. They get leave to ſend their deputies to the emperor about it.

THE Roman officers, that ſerv'd under Petronius in the government of Syria, were all of them for a war, giving for granted, that in caſe of declining it, the firſt fury of the emperor's diſpleaſure would fall upon them, as the heads of a ſedition. So that it was ſo much time clear gain'd, as was ſpent in deliberations, till the ſtatue might be got ready; for there was none brought out of Italy, nor ſo much as any order taken for the beſt that might be found in Syria; which was a ſpecial act of providence in favour of God's people; for the tumult would have broken out elſe before they could have made any proviſion againſt it: for a man is not half maſter of his reaſon in the hurry of a ſurprize.

WHEREFORE Petronius gave orders for a ſtatue to be made; and ſent for the greateſt maſters of Phœnicia, to adviſe withal about it, ſupplied them with all materials, and Sidon was the place appointed for the work. He ſent notice likewiſe of the emperor's pleaſure to the high-prieſts and eminent officers of the Jews, adviſing by all means to ſubmit cheerfully to their maſter's pleaſure, for fear of worſe conſequences. For the Syrian troops, he told them, had their particular orders to lay the whole country waſte with fire and ſword, in caſe of diſobedience. Now Petronius went this way to work, upon an opinion that if he could but mollify the great ones, the reſt would follow in courſe. But he was wonderfully out in his conjecture; for the very mention of the thing ſtruck them into ſuch a conſternation, that they burſt out into ſo profuſe an exceſs of weeping, as if their eyes had been fountains of tears, and all this without one word ſpeaking: and from thence they paſſed into frantick violences of tearing their hair, and their beards, and ſo by degrees into lamentations in words at length.

" AND have we lived now, they cry'd, to " ſee, at this time of day, that which none of " our fore-fathers ever ſo much as thought of!
" But what do we talk of ſeeing any thing
" without eyes to ſee withal? For, rather " than entertain thoſe eyes we have, with a " ſpectacle ſo impious and execrable, that a
" perſon cannot ſo much as hear or think of
" it without horror; rather than ſo, we'll
" part with our eyes and our miſerable lives
" together."

THE fame of this reſolution was no ſooner bruited in Jeruſalem, and from thence up and down in Judea, but the Jews, all as one man, quitted their towns, caſtles, and dwellings, and drawing into a body, as by conſent, they took their march directly toward Phenicia, to look for Petronius, who was then at his command. Upon the firſt ſight of this prodigious multitude, ſeveral of Petronius's friends adviſed him to look to himſelf, for there was a mighty army advancing againſt him; and ſo they took it to be, as believing it impoſſible for the Jews alone to furniſh ſuch a body.

As the Jews advanced ſtill nearer and nearer, they came at laſt to cover the whole country as with a cloud, but without either arms, all this while, or any thing of guards, only the air was filled with ſuch frightful outcries and lamentations, that when the noiſe was gone, the echo ſtill continued. When the clamorous part was over, they entertained themſelves with diſcourſes and ejaculations ſuitable to the occaſion. The people marched in ſix diviſions; old men, young men, and boys; old women, young women, and virgins: three on the one hand and three on the other.

WHEN they came within ſight of Petronius, who was mounted upon a ſeat of eminence, they caſt themſelves upon the ground before him, all in their ranks, as ſupplicants, and in ſo moving a manner, in the harmony of their ways and actions, as if they had been all govern'd by one ſpirit: neither were they leſs tender upon the ſcruple of modeſty in their behaviour; for though Petronius called to them to riſe and draw near, it was ſome time before they could be perſuaded to it. But at laſt they got up, and in ſack-cloth and aſhes, with their hands bound behind them like condemned priſoners, they advanced up toward the governor, where one of the ſenators addreſſed himſelf to Petronius in theſe terms.

" HERE, we are, ſays he to Petronius,
" without arms, to ſhew that we bring no
" hoſtile intention along with us; but thoſe
" hands that nature gave us for the uſe of " arms are put out of condition to ſerve us in " that capacity. We bring our very bodies at " mercy too, our wives, children, and fami" lies, in the quality of petitioners, firſt to " Petronius, and then by his means to Caius.
" We have not left one ſoul at home, and our " prayer is either that we may be all preſerv-
" ed, or all deſtroyed. We are naturally lo" vers of peace, and it is our intereſts as well
" as our inclinations ſo to be, in regard of " the benefits we receive from it. When
" Caius came to the empire, and the notice of
" it to Vitellius, your predeceſſor in the go" vernment, and at that time living among us,
" we were the firſt of all Syria to gratulate
" his acceſſion to the ſovereignty, and to
" ſpread the joyful news of his elevation
" through other cities and places. Was it
" not our temple alſo that firſt offered up vows
" and ſacrifices for the happineſs of his life
" and reign? And are we now to be the firſt,
" if not the only temple, that is to be depri" ved of the exerciſe and enjoyment of our " religious worſhip? If the quitting of our " houſes, privileges, and poſſeſſions publick
" and private, may be worth your acceptance,
" we are ready to lay them all at your feet.
" And ſo for the matter of plate, houſhold" ſtuff, or whatever we have that is more pre" cious, it is at your ſervice for the asking:
" and with ſo good a heart too, that we ſhall
" reckon ourſelves upon the receiving hand,
" even in what we give. And all upon this
" ſingle condition, that the temple may ſtand

" as

" as it did, and continue inviolate, as we re" ceived it from our fore-fathers. Grant us
" this ſingle requeſt, and we'll ask no more.
" But if nothing leſs than our religion will " content you, pray take away our lives too,
" without forcing us upon a life of torment,
" worſe than a thouſand deaths. We are
" threaten'd here with armed troops and mi" litary executions, if any of us ſhall preſume
" to obſtruct the intended dedication. Why,
" no man is ſo mad, as to ſet himſelf up in " contradiction to his maſter; but let them
" ſtrike, cut, and hack us to pieces, and do all
" that a victorious enemy can pretend to, ſo
" long as they may do it ſecurely, without " any danger of their own blood. But what " needs an army be drawn out for ſuch an " execution; where there's only a butchery
" on the one ſide, and not ſo much as a de" fence on the other? As for ſacrifices, we " may do the work of our own prieſts our-
" ſelves, upon the victims of our own wives,
" brothers and ſiſters, ſons and daughters; and " content ourſelves with the denomination of " men, women, and children ſlayers; for tra-
" gical caſes muſt have tragical terms. And
" what have we to do now after ſpilling ſo
" much innocent blood of other people, but to " lay violent hands upon ourſelves, and mingle
" our own with it too in one common maſs!
" ending our days at laſt, with this prayer in " our mouths, that God will not be offended
" with us for an action that carries along with
" it ſo great a deference to the authority of " the emperor, and at the ſame time to the " ſacredneſs of our holy profeſſion. This will " be the caſe, if we have the hearts to con-
" temn a life that a good man would be a" ſhamed to lead. There is an old ſtory a" mong the Greek fables of Gorgon's head,
" that turned every thing to ſtone that did
" but look upon it. The report, 'tis true, is " but a fiction, and yet not without ſome em-
" blematical reſemblances of truth, eſpecially
" in many accidents of aſtoniſhment and ſur-
" prize. The diſpleaſure of a maſter is mor-
" tal, or ſomewhat that comes near up to it.
" And now, Petronius, do but you imagine,
" if ſome of our people ſhould ſee ſuch a ſtatue
" brought into the temple, as you have here
" before you (which heaven forbid!) would
" they not look, do you think, like men turn" ed into marble at the ſpectacle? Their eyes
" ſet in their heads, and nature itſelf out of " condition for all the offices of life? But to " come to a concluſion, we do not deſire an
" abſolute diſcharge of our obedience, but " time and leave only to addreſs ourſelves by
" our deputies, to his imperial majeſty for re" lief. Who knows but he may be wrought
" upon to grant us a toleration of our holy
" laws and worſhip, and a liberty in common
" with the reſt of the world? for we ask no
" more, than what all other nations enjoy
" without exception, in the preſervation of
" thoſe rites and traditions that we have re" ceived inviolate from our fore-fathers, in " favour both of our cuſtoms and manners, ap-
" prov'd, confirm'd, and ratify'd to us by the " decrees of his grand-father and great grand" father. Who knows, I ſay, but ſuch a re-
" monſtrance as this may mollify him? The " hearts of princes are variable, like thoſe of " other people, neither is their diſpleaſure e" verlaſting; for commonly they that are moſt
" ſubject to anger are ſooneſt appeaſed. We are
" wounded here with calumnies, and there's no
" remedy like truth; which is all we have to " offer, and that we may not be condemned
" without a hearing: or, admit the worſt, ſup-
" poſing we ſhould find the prince inexorable,
" the cauſe is but where it was, for he may
" ſtill do the ſame thing afterward, that he " would have done before. And now for our " laſt requeſt, Petronius, and in the names of this
" vaſt multitude, be but ſo good and generous,
" we beſeech you, as not to oppoſe an embaſſy
" that has ſo many thouſands of lives depend" ing upon it: and pray be pleaſed to know
" that we do not contend for profit, but for " piety, in any other ſenſe than as godlineſs is
" the greateſt gain.

CHAP. XV.

Petronius writes to Caius about the Jews, and gains time by it. Caius enraged at Petronius, but diſſembles the matter.

THIS remonſtrance, made by the moſt honourable of the ſenators, with pathetic vehemence of lamentations and outcries, in favour of their laws and worſhip, was received by them that were preſent with all the tenderneſs and compaſſion imaginable, as appeared by their looks, actions, geſtures, and behaviour upon the hearing of it: and it wrought likewiſe upon Petronius among the reſt. Now Petronius was a ſoft good-natured perſon, a moderate man, and a lover of truth and juſtice; and he was ſo far a friend to the Jews too, that he thought they had ſevere treatment, and diſcovered his inclinations in his very countenance. He obſerved upon ſome diſcourſe he had with his fellow commiſſioners, that the people were mightily come about, and from violent prejudices againſt him, to manifeſt partiality in his favour. Thus it was, and Petronius was highly pleaſed with that change of humour. He was no ſtranger all this while to the implacable ſpirit of the emperor, and to the bitterneſs of his natural cruelty; but he ſeemed to act yet in ſome meaſure under a philoſophical conduct, and under the government of a Jewiſh piety: whether he was influenc'd to do this from principles early imbib'd in his youth, or that it was the effect of what he had learn'd ſince his coming to the government of Aſia and Syria, where they had Jews in abundance in all their towns; or whether he acted as a man whoſe genius led him to the ſtudy and knowledge of uſeful things; or whether it be, that God puts good things in the heads of good men, for the common benefit, both of themſelves, and of the publick, as it fell out upon this occaſion. The ſtatuaries had their orders, to provide as perfect a figure, as art and hands could make; but for fear of the worſt, to take time and care about it, for the longer the piece was under the chizel in the making, the longer would the reputation of it laſt in the world after it ſhould be finiſhed. Petronius however would not agree upon any terms to the Jews ſending of an embaſſy, for fear of a greater miſchief, in leaving them at the mercy of a powerful, a cruel, and a capricious prince.

And so for either granting or refusing, he found it dangerous both ways. But the way, at last, that he pitched upon, was a letter to Caius, setting forth the pretended supplications of the Jews, and without any reflexions upon them, by way of accusation and complaint. The delay of the dedication was imputed to the very nature of the case, and fix'd upon the workmen, who must of necessity have some certain space of time allowed them for the performance of covenants. So that step after step, one obstruction was made the ground and pretence of another; and in this interim, who knew but Caius himself might find it reasonable to change his mind. For harvest being just now begun, and the Jews in a most outragious fit of despair for the profanation of their laws and religion, what if they should have pushed on this violence to the contempt of their lives, and laid the whole country waste, by setting fire to their own corn in revenge? This was no idle apprehension, and there was early care taken by Petronius for the reaping of the grain, and the gathering of the fruits; partly by way of prevention, and partly for a publick supply in case of need. For it was at that time generally reported that Caius had some thoughts of a voyage for Alexandria in Egypt; though it seemed not very likely yet, that so great a prince should expose his person to the difficulties of a long sea, with such a numerous train of attendance; when the way about by the coasts of Asia and Syria, would have been so much a more commodious passage; where he might have embarqued or disembarqued at pleasure, having at command two hundred long boats, for the use and service of the coasts, beside vessels of burden for the ocean. Now it was an absolute necessity, to store Syria with all manner of provision from one end of it to the other; especially the towns that lay upon the sea; and all little enough to answer the necessities of the time and place. For there never was such a multitude of people gotten together from all places, and of all conditions, as upon this juncture: men of honour, civil and military, land and sea officers, and servants almost as many as soldiers: and all at last to be provided for, not as we say with bare necessaries, but in a proportion of state and plenty, answerable to the dignity of so illustrious a prince.

THERE was no body doubted, but that the emperor, upon the reading of this letter, would be highly pleased both with the prudence and the conduct, even in the very point of the delay itself; not for the Jews sake, but for the advantage of securing the fruits and the corn. This letter, in fine, was approved and transcribed, and a messenger sent away with all expedition with a fair copy of it. Caius looked as pale as death upon the reading of it, and so soon as that conscious hint was a little over, he clapt his hands, and brake out into a furious violence of words as well as gesture.

"WELL Petronius, says the prince, thou "art the better man of the two sure, and if "Petronius will not hear the emperor, the "emperor must hear Petronius. But thou art "so puffed up with the vanity of a splendid "commission and a full employment, that it "looks as if there were not such a thing as "Caius in nature: but it will not be long be-"fore thou are given to understand the con-"trary. The greatest enemies I have in the "world are the Jews; and yet their laws are "more to thee than the commands of thy "prince; and what's all this at the bottom, "but that thou art afraid of the multitude? "And what signifies that, when thou hast a "power in thy hands to encounter the strength "of the kings of Parthia themselves, and the "force of the whole east? Well but there's "pity in the case too, and at that rate thy "compassion does more with thee than thy "duty. But what's to be said to the provi-"dence of saving the harvest? That frivo-"lous pretence will cost you your head before "you are aware; and so for your pretended "care of having stores in readiness for my "voyage, 'tis as vile and evasive a pretence as "any of the rest. For supposing a scarcity in "Judea, even to the degree of a famine, the "neighbouring provinces, upon such an emer-"gent occasion, would be able to supply the "want. But what do I stand talking for, "when I should be doing? Wherefore let "this fellow feel what he has deserv'd, with-"out any more words: and so I have done "menacing, but my indignation burns on "still".

Caius, upon this, made a short pause, and dictated to one of his secretaries an answer to Petronius, which was in appearance very much to the honour of the governor's providence and foresight. For there were some of the governors he stood in awe of, for fear of their tampering the people into a revolt, especially in large and populous provinces, with mighty armies in them, as in that tract of ground along the Euphrates. When he had cajol'd Petronius for a while, with formalities of respect and fair words, (but an implacable venom under that cloke) he gave him a positive command, all other business apart, to see the image dedicated the first thing he did: "For, says he, harvest being now over, "there is no longer any colour for a further "delay."

CHAP. XVI.

King Agrippa comes to Rome, and upon hearing that the image was to be consecrated, he falls into a swoon; and then coming to himself again, he writes to the prince about it.

SOON after this, came king Agrippa to Rome, to pay his duty to the emperor, after his usual manner; but without knowing any thing as yet of what had pass'd betwixt Caius and Petronius; only somewhat he gather'd however, from an angry cloud he saw in the face of Caius, that there was a storm a coming, though he could not guess where it would fall; so that he put himself to the uttermost scrutiny of thought, word, and deed, to try if he could find himself conscious of any thing that might give offence: but upon standing that test, he concluded, that the emperor's displeasure look'd some other way, as in truth it did: but then considering afterwards, that the emperor's eye was much fiercer when it was intent upon him alone than when he look'd another way, he fell again into his former apprehenſion. He was thinking many times to ask the emperor the reaſon of this alteration; but then the curioſity he thought would be ſo raſh and unmannerly, that he did not know what miſchief he might draw upon himſelf by it.

Caius, that was as well read in faces as any man, obſerving Agrippa to be troubled and uneaſy, laid hold of this occaſion to break the ice of the difficulty. "Agrippa, ſays he, "you are in doubt, I perceive; and I am now "about to tell you the thing you ſo much deſire "to know. You have not been ſo long about "me ſure, as to be now ignorant that I diſ-"courſe with my eyes as well as with my "tongue. The good people of your nation "are the only men under the ſun, that re-"fuſe to own Caius for a god; and in the "contumacy of their diſobedience, plunge "themſelves beyond redemption into a cer-"tain death. It is my poſitive command to "have the image of Jupiter ſet up in their "temple; and ſee what multitudes are ga-"thered together now from all quarters, un-"der the pretext of ſupplicants and petition-"ers, but in effect to trample my authority "under their feet."

As he was going forward, king Agrippa was obſerved to change colour all on a ſudden, a violent horror ſeizing him from head to foot, a trembling all over his body, and his legs failing him to that degree, that if by-ſtanders had not ſupported him, he muſt have fallen at his length upon the ground. He fell, in ſhort, into a fainting fit, and in that condition they carried him home, without any ſenſe or knowledge of what paſs'd.

This accident, inſtead of working upon the emperor's good-nature, ſerv'd only for a further incentive to his rage againſt the Jews. "Well, ſays Caius, if Agrippa, my familiar "friend, and one that has received ſo many "good offices from me: —— If Agrippa him-"ſelf, I ſay, has ſo great a veneration for his "country's rites and cuſtoms, as not to en-"dure ſo much as one word to their preju-"dice, without falling into a ſwoon, what "good am I to look for from others, that have "none of theſe conſiderations to work upon "them in my favour?"

Agrippa lay all that day, and part of the next, dozing and ſenſeleſs, till toward evening, and then he began to raiſe his head a little, and with much ado to open his eyes, dazzling as they were, toward the company, without knowing one face that was there preſent. He fell then into a ſomewhat ſounder ſleep, as appeared by the drawing of his breath, and the temper of his body. When he had lain thus a while, he awak'd, and call'd out to know where he was. "Am I with the "emperor, or no; and is he preſent? Have "a good heart, they cry'd, for you are at "home, and Caius is not here: you have e'en "ſlept long enough, wherefore ſit up a little, "and ſee if you know us: here are none but "your own people, friends, freed-men, ſer-"vants, and thoſe that wiſh you well". In fine, the tenderneſs they expreſs'd to him in his diſtreſs, brought him in ſome meaſure to himſelf again. Upon the phyſicians ordering the company to withdraw, that the patient might be quiet, and at liberty for remedies and refreſhments, "Never trouble your "heads, ſays Agrippa, with delicacies for my "palate; a coarſe diet, and a good ſtomach, "is all I ask, and more yet than I ſhould "make uſe of, if it were not for the hopes I "have yet left me, of living to be ſerviceable, "even at the laſt extremity, to my miſerable "country." Theſe laſt words were accompany'd with tears, and ſo he took a repaſt of what was juſt neceſſary to keep him alive, and no more. His food was plain and ſimple, and his drink water, without one drop of wine. And now, ſays he, upon the finiſhing of his meal, "I have paid a debt to nature, ſo that "I have nothing more left me to do, but moſt "dutifully to ſolicit Caius about the preſent "ſtate of things." And ſo he call'd for a tablet, and wrote this following letter to the emperor:

Sir,

BETWIXT the fear and the reverence I have for your imperial majeſty, in the dread of your high diſpleaſure, on the one hand, and in the veneration I have for the dignity of your ſacred character, on the other; I have rather preſum'd to lay my humble duty at your majeſty's feet in writing, than to venture upon it in an addreſs by word of mouth.

It may be laid down for a maxim, that all men living have a natural affection for the place where they were born, and an awful reverence for the laws they were brought up in; which is a truth that hath been abundantly aſſerted in the piety, great prince, of your profeſſion and practice. And it is as natural again for every man to like his own way beſt, whether it be ſo or no, becauſe we are govern'd in particular caſes more by paſſion than by reaſon.

As to myſelf, I ſhall not need to inform you, ſir, that I am by nation a Jew, by birth of Jeruſalem, the ſeat of the holy temple that ſtands there dedicated in a moſt peculiar manner to the honour of the moſt high God. As to my predeceſſors, ſome of them have been kings, others high-prieſts, upon which dignity they valu'd themſelves more than upon the authority royal; computing upon it, that as God is above man, ſo the ſacerdotal character is above the civil; the one exerciſing itſelf in divine matters, and the other only in human.

Now ſuch is the nearneſs of the relation I have, and of my manifold obligations to this nation, country, and temper, that I cannot but implore your royal grace and favour on their behalf. And firſt for the nation, that they may not be forc'd over from the profeſſion of their own religion to the contrary; eſpecially conſidering how true and loyal they have ever been to your illuſtrious family: no people under the heavens ſo frank of their vows and prayers for the welfare and proſperity of your empire, or ſo free of their ſacrifices and oblations, not only upon ſolemn feſtivals, but daily; and this not only in plauſible words and forms, but with a piety of reverence and affection, that came from the very hearts and ſouls of them; and without any exception, ſaving only in caſes of inconſiſtence with their laws and religion.

And

And I have this to say further now for the holy city, and the place of my birth; which is not to be look'd upon as the metropolis only of Judea, but of many other colonies that have been planted from thence; as Egypt, Phenicia, upper and lower Syria, Pamphylia, Cilicia, and several parts of Asia, as far as Bithynia, and Pontus; and so in Europe, there's Thessaly, Boetia, Macedonia, Etolia, Athens, Argos, Corinth, and the better part of Peloponnesus: and not only the continent, but the islands also of a most eminent note, are filled with Jewish plantations; as Euboea, Cyprus, Crete; to say nothing of those beyond the Euphrates: for, in short, bating only a small part of Babylon, and some other governments, there is hardly a city that is good for any thing, but in the possession of the Jews: so that if this be the case, I am not a suitor for my own country alone, but for the common good of Asia, Europe, and Africa; sea and land, islands and continent, all under one: For the interest of the whole depends upon the same act of clemency; and I hope my confidence will be the more pardonable, for the zeal I have to be an instrument in a mediation so much to the honour of Cesar. For what can be more agreeable to the spirit and genius of so glorious a prince, than the ministring so fair an occasion of obliging the whole world at once, and consequently, the perpetuating of your name and memory to all ages, as the guardian-angel of mankind.

You have been pleas'd, at the request of some particular friends, to make whole towns free citizens of Rome, and masters of those that were but servants before; and in so doing, your kindness was as great to the procurers of this bounty, as to the receivers of it. I am sensible of being under the command of a master, and yet give me leave to value myself upon the title of a friend too; and a friend not inferior to many in dignity, but above all others in good-will and respect; for it has ever been so, and in honour and gratitude it must ever so continue. And yet after all this, I have not the confidence to open my mouth for my countrymen, for grants and privileges; no, not so much as for the common freedom, or immunity from taxes. The grace that I have to beg would be of high advantage to them, 'tis true, and of no sort of inconvenience to Cesar; for what greater blessing can a subject desire than the favour of his prince? Was it not Jerusalem that first gratulated the accession of Caius to the empire? and was it not Jerusalem again, that sent the joyful tidings of it into all the neighbouring provinces? the very providence of making the Jews subservient to such a revolution, may deserve some sort of acknowledgment. As the eldest son of the family is reputed the most honourable, because it was he that first entitled his parents to the reverend names of father and mother; so that city, one would think, that first saluted Caius by the name of emperor, should be treated as well, at least, if not better, than any of the rest.

I have been thus far an advocate for my country, but my last prayer must be for our temple. This temple, Caius, is the house of God, and there was never any image made with hands admitted into it. The works of painters and statuaries are the figures only of sensible gods; but for a picture-drawer or engraver to offer at any sort of representation of the invisible God, was looked upon as an abomination. Agrippa, your grandfather, had a mighty reverence for this temple. Augustus provided expresly for the supplying of it with the first-fruits from all quarters, and the offering of daily sacrifices in it. Your great grandmother had likewise an high veneration for it. Neither Greek, in fine, nor Barbarian; neither prince nor potentate; no, nor the deadliest enemies we had, sedition, war, bondage, desolation, or the most destructive of other calamities, could ever prevail upon us to receive the idol of an image into the temple. Not that it had no enemies, but its religion was safe still; for being dedicated to the father and author of all things, it struck people into a dread of the judgments that frequently attend such violations; so that they durst not venture to sow the seeds of wickedness, for fear of reaping the fruits of it themselves. We shall not need to look abroad for instances, having so many nearer home.

In the reign of Herod, my grandfather, your grandfather Marcus Agrippa pass'd the compliment upon him of a visit into Judea, where he coasted along the sea-side up to Jerusalem. Upon the view of the temple, he was so transported with the glories of the fabrick, the solemnities of the sacerdotal rites and ceremonies, the simplicity of the people's manners, and, in fine, with the delight of so curious and wonderful a spectacle, that he was continually saying something or other to the honour of that illustrious structure; insomuch, that for the time he staid there, he never miss'd so much as one day's attendance, but still paid his constant visits, entertaining himself all the while in the contemplation of holy vests, the order of the sacrifices, and the awful majesty of the high-priest, in his rich pontifical robes, as he sat mounted above the rest. In fine, when he had presented his donatives to the holy temple, and shew'd himself as indulgent to the citizens as was possible, saving only an exemption from taxes, Herod accompany'd Agrippa to the sea-side, upon his return, where they exchang'd mutual acknowledgments of the high obligations they had the one to the other; the people strewing the passage all the way he went with boughs and flowers, in token of the veneration they had for his piety and bounty.

And so, sir, for your great uncle Tiberius; was not he manifestly of the same principle and judgment? did not our religion, and our temple stand firm and safe, through the whole three and twenty years of Tiberius's reign, without any sort of innovation? nay, there is something that I both can and must say to Tiberius's honour, tho' I myself had very hard measure from him. But truth is truth, and I am sure you will have the patience to hear it.

When Pilate was governor of Judea, he dedicated to Tiberius certain gilt bucklers; not so much out of respect to the emperor, as in pure spite to the Jews; and they were erected in the palace of Herod in Jerusalem. They had no sort of figure upon them, nor any thing that was prohibited, but barely the two names of the dedicator, and the person to whom they were dedicated. When the story came to be nois'd among the people, they made application tion preſently to the king's four ſons, with ſome branches of the royal family, and ſeveral other perſons of eminent condition, to employ their intereſt with Pilate to have theſe bucklers remov'd, as a violation of the laws and religion of their country, which former kings and emperors had ever reputed ſacred. Pilate, who was of a perverſe and ill-natured temper, made the mediators ſo rude and churliſh a reply to the motion, that it put the multitude into wild and diſorderly exclamations.

Let people be quiet, they cry'd, that would be quiet, without inflaming men to war and ſedition, and to the imbroiling the publick peace, as if the honour of the emperor depended upon the violation of the law; never thinking of covering an injuſtice with ſo weak a pretext. If you have any thing to ſhew in your juſtification from Tiberius, whether edict, letter, or any thing like it, do but ſhew us the warrant, and we have no more to do, ſave only to addreſs ourſelves, with humble petitions and remonſtrances, to our lord and maſter, for redreſs, without taking any farther notice of Pilate; for Tiberius, we are ſure, will never approve of this oppreſſion.

This notion of applying themſelves to Ceſar, by remonſtrance or deputation, ſtartled Pilate more than any thing elſe, for fear of laying him open to the world in the hiſtory of his other iniquities; as corruption, juſtice expoſs'd to ſale, raping, violence, ruin, torments, the ſpilling of innocent blood, and the moſt barbarous of cruelties. This cholerick angry man was yet ſo divided within himſelf, that as he had no mind to gratify the ſubject, ſo he had not the confidence neither to withdraw any thing that was made ſacred by a dedication, being well acquainted with the humour of Tiberius in ſuch caſes over and above. When the great men found matters in this ſtate, and that Pilate repented himſelf of what he had done, however he diſſembled it, they repreſented the caſe to Tiberius by way of letter, in the moſt tender dutiful manner that could be devis'd. Tiberius had no ſooner notice of Pilate's language and behaviour, but he broke out into a violent paſſion, though a man not eaſily mov'd neither. But this will do better in the ſtory itſelf, than in a bare deſcription.

The firſt thing he did was, without any delay, to write to Pilate about it, with a ſevere rebuke for his impudence, and a poſitive command immediately to remove the bucklers, and to have them tranſported into the temple that was built at Ceſarea, (a ſea-port) in honour of Auguſtus. This expedient was as good as a ſalvo to the honour of the emperor, and the antient cuſtoms of the city. Theſe bucklers, in thoſe days, had no gravers work upon them; and the point now in queſtion is the graven image. It was then only in the governor's palace, but it is now to be erected, as I am inform'd, in the ſanctuary; a place ſo venerable and ſacred, that only the high-prieſt is allow'd entrance, and that but upon one day in the year too, and after a ſolemn faſt, to burn incenſe to the glory of God, and to offer up prayers to the Almighty, according to cuſtom, for a happy year, and the common peace of mankind.

If any other of our own people, either prieſt or layman, ſhall preſume to enter this holy place contrary to the law, it is made death without mercy: as for example, if the high-prieſt ſhall dare to enter above one day in a year, or three or four times over, for the purpoſe, upon that day of his entrance, it will moſt certainly coſt him his life: ſo tender was our lawgiver of preſerving the reverence of that holy place ſacred and inviolate. Now if the rigour was ſo ſtrict and capital in theſe nice caſes, you may eaſily imagine, ſir, what an uproar it would create to have an image ſet up there, where the high-prieſt himſelf was not to be admitted but upon certain limitations. How many of our prieſts would ſacrifice themſelves, their wives and children, in one common pile of carcaſſes, rather than outlive the ſight and ſufferance of ſuch an abomination.

This was the caſe in the days of Tiberius. And now for Auguſtus, the beſt and the greateſt prince that ever ſat upon the imperial throne; his very name being given him out of a deference to his conduct and virtue; a prince to whom the whole world was indebted for the bleſſing of an univerſal peace: this illuſtrious prince, upon ſome diſcourſe he had concerning our temple, was given to underſtand, that no carved image was ſuffer'd to be brought into it, and for this very reaſon, that the inviſible God was not to be repreſented by a viſible figure. Upon which he was highly pleas'd with the reaſon, and the piety of the thing; and being a prince moreover of profound literature himſelf, he paſs'd ſeveral reflections upon what had been ſaid; partly recollecting what he had heard from the learned men he had conſtantly about him, and partly pondering and arguing the matter in his own thoughts. He was, in fine, ſo great a lover of letters, that his very table diſcourſes were as good as philoſophy lectures, and his feſtival entertainments were accommodated to the relief and ſatisfaction both of body and mind. Not to multiply inſtances, in proof of this prince's generoſity and good will toward our people, I ſhall make uſe only of two.

First, upon notice that there was not ſuch care taken for the return of our firſt-fruits as the matter requir'd, the emperor wrote to the governors of the provinces in Aſia, not to give any ſort of interruption to the Jews meeting in their ſynagogues, (but this liberty was not to be extended to any other) for the Jews meetings are not like the feaſts of Bacchus, to encourage drunkenneſs, tumults, riots, and ſedition, but ſchools rather of piety and common juſtice. And ſo for their yearly firſt-fruits, they were only intended for ſacrifices to be offer'd up to God in the temple. This was followed with an expreſs command, not to give the Jews any diſturbance about their meetings or collections after the manner of their country. I may miſtake the words of the order, but the ſubſtance of it I am ſure of, as your majeſty will find in a letter from Norbanus, whereof this is a true copy.

C. Norbanus Flaccus, proconſul, to the magiſtrates of Epheſus, greeting.

" Cesar has ſignify'd unto me by letter, " that whereas the Jews continue their old " way of religious meetings, and of collect- " ing monies to be ſent to Jeruſalem, under " the name of firſt-fruits, it is his imperial " majeſty's will and pleaſure, that they be all " left at liberty ſo to do. Of this you are to " take notice, and to pay your obedience ac- " cordingly.

WHAT clearer evidence, under favour, can there be in the world of Ceſar's opinion of our temple, than the indulging of the Jews in the publick exerciſe of their worſhip, the freedom of their collections for holy uſes, and the countenancing of them in other offices of piety?

AND there is yet another argument of the good-will that Auguſtus bare us: that is to ſay, he order'd the daily ſacrifice of a bull and two lambs, out of his own revenue, to be offer'd up to the honour of our God: and the parctice of it hath been kept up ever ſince to this very day, without any diſcontinuance. This oblation Ceſar deſign'd for the altar, and yet he very well underſtood that there was no image in the caſe, either within or without. But this wiſe and learned prince was nevertheleſs convinc'd of the neceſſity of having ſome glorious temple upon earth, dedicated in a peculiar manner to the inviſible God; where men might offer up their devotions in hope of having their prayers heard and granted, and without any viſible figure.

AND now, with your majeſty's leave, yet once again, what did your great grandmother the empreſs Julia, but write after the copy of her great maſter and husband, Auguſtus, in the profuſion of her royal bounties upon this temple; as veſſels of gold and ſilver, with other ornaments and preſents to an ineſtimable value? But to what end was all this without image-work? For women's minds are commonly weak, and hard to be wrought upon, ſave only by ſenſible objects. But for this princeſs however, that was as much beyond other women in a maſculine vigour of perſpicacity and judgment as in all other excellencies, ſhe ſupply'd the defects of the ſex by ſtudy and meditation, and gave herſelf up ſo entirely to thought and ſpeculation, that ſhe looked upon ſenſible objects to be no more than a ſhadow of the ſpiritual.

AND now, great ſir, after ſo many glorious inſtances of tenderneſs and clemency out of your own family, and thoſe of your anceſtors in particular from whom you have received both your life and government, be but ſo gracious towards our people as your predeceſſors have been, every man of them before you. Here are emperors interceding for our laws to an emperor, ſeveral auguſt princes to one, grand-fathers and great grand-fathers, to a grand-child many to a ſingle perſon, &c. and what's the requeſt at laſt, but this? They do all humbly beg of you, not to make void thoſe laws and cuſtoms, that from their firſt eſtabliſhment have been kept ſacred to this very day. Theſe acts, 'tis true, may be vacated, and theſe innovations wrought perhaps, without any judicial vengeance ſubſequent to the tranſgreſſion: but whoever conſiders the uncertainty of the future, and that divine juſtice is nevertheleſs ſure for being ſometimes ſlow, it will make his heart ake to think of the conſequences, if at the ſame time he believes there is a God.

IF I ſhould take upon myſelf now to enumerate the infinite obligations I have to your majeſty, my time would not ſerve me to recount them; neither would it become me to handle ſo ſacred a ſubject as by the bye. But the thing ſpeaks itſelf without telling the ſtory. It is no ſecret, ſir, that I was in irons, and that I ſtand indebted to yourſelf for my liberty; but I hope you did not eaſe me of thoſe chains, to load me with heavier inſtead of them. In that caſe, my ſuffering was only in one part of my body; but in this, my very ſoul ſinks under the burthen. You did firſt deliver me from the dread of death, and you received me afterwards out of death itſelf, ſo that Agrippa deſires no more now than that Ceſar would preſerve the life he has reſtor'd: for otherwiſe, I have only out-lived a leſs calamity to periſh by a greater.

IT is to your royal bounty that I am a debtor for the gift and dignity of a crown; and after that, for the addition of another and a greater command, in Trachonitis and Galilee. But after the multiplying of ſo many extraordinary favours upon me, do not deprive me, I beſeech you, of things the moſt neceſſary of all others. I am not ſolicitous for fear of either loſing my commiſſion or of being degraded into my former ſtation, but my requeſt is, once for all, that the laws of my country may be protected and maintained. For what will the world ſay of me elſe, either Jews or others? Now one of theſe two things muſt neceſſarily follow: either I ſhall be looked upon as a betrayer of my country, or as a perſon utterly loſt to the honour of your friendſhip; and what could make me more miſerable than either of them? For ſuppoſing myſelf to be ſtill in the number of your confidents, and at the ſame time to ſuffer my country to go to wreck, I muſt certainly incur the character of a falſe man, for employing my intereſt no better, upon a preſumption that emperors and princes deny no ſuch boons to their favourites. Or if I ſhould be ſo unhappy now, as to have loſt the bleſſing of your tenderneſs and good graces, do not lay me in chains I beſeech you, as Tiberius did; but inſtead of my liberty, pray take away my life this very moment, and that's all I ask. For what ſignifies life to me after the loſs of your friendſhip; which is the only hope and comfort I had in this world?

CHAP. XVII.

Caius, upon Agrippa's letter, orders Petronius to make no alteration in the temple of Jeruſalem. He repents of it, and countermands his own order. He goes to Alexandria, and claims divine worſhip. The inhuman cruelties of this prince.

AGRIPPA ſeals up and ſends away his letter to Caius; and after that keeps cloſe in his own houſe, expecting in great pain the iſſue of that paper, and under an anxious apprehenſion for fear the importunity might be unſeaſonable; for the liberty and ſafety not only of Judea, but of all the Jews over the face of the earth, were at ſtake upon it.

UPON the reading of this letter, Caius diſcover'd cover'd in his countenance ſeveral motions and changes of thought and humour: one while he was vexed that he had not gone through with his work; another while he ſeemed to be moved with the juſtice of the pretence, and the modeſty of the application. And then again, he would be reflecting by fits upon Agrippa's conduct; ſometimes commending and ſometimes blaming him. He did ill, he ſaid, in being ſo zealous for his country-men, whom he knew to be the greateſt enemies in nature to the conſecration that was then in queſtion: but then it was frank and generous, he ſaid, to own his opinion and to act according to his judgment. Theſe deliberations brought Caius into a better temper, and drew this anſwer from him: "That upon the inſtance of Agrippa, he was prevailed upon to countermand "the dedication." Writing at the ſame time to Petronius the governor of Syria, not to ſuffer any innovations in the Jews temple. But leſt the prohibition ſhould be more effectual than he intended it, he ſubjoin'd a menace with it in the ſame letter to qualify the obligation: and it ran in theſe words: "Always provided that if any perſon whatſoever ſhall preſume to obſtruct or oppoſe the dedication of any altars, temples, or images, to the honour of our royal ſelf or family, in any town, city, or other place whatſoever, the metropolis of Jeruſalem only excepted, every ſuch perſon ſo offending, ſhall be either puniſh'd upon the place, in the very act of his inſolence, or otherwiſe remitted to our imperial will and pleaſure to be dealt withal according to juſtice."

This clauſe was effectually an abrogating of the grant, and no other than the doing and undoing of a thing, obliquely, in the ſame breath: beſide that it tended naturally to the drawing on of a civil war; for every body expected that the enemies of the Jews would fill the whole country with their ſacrilegious abominations, not ſo much out of reſpect to Caius as out of malice to us: and then the Jews themſelves, they thought on the other hand, would never have the patience to endure the ſight of theſe prophanations: ſo that upon the leaſt provocation of a tumult, the image would have been commanded up again. But divine providence had ſo ordered it, that the people were all quiet beyond expectation; and without giving the leaſt occaſion for ſuch a broil. They were quiet, 'tis true; and little the better for it, ſo long as Caius continued as buſy and troubleſome as ever he was, repenting himſelf of his very charity and compliance, and reviving the violence of his former rigour. There was now no longer any talk of the ſtatue at Sidon, for fear of inflaming the multitude: but there was another appointed to be made at Rome, of copper gilded; and care taken for ſending it away by ſea ſo privately, that it ſhould be ſet up in the temple before people were aware. But this was to be done as by chance upon the occaſion of Caius's voyage into Egypt.

Now Caius's heart being mightily ſet upon a viſit to Alexandria, he ſpared for no coſt for the convenience of his paſſage; imagining that this was the propereſt place in the world for the advancing of his ridiculous deſign of conſecration; in reſpect both of the authority and example of that leading city, and likewiſe in regard of the ſituation of it, for an univerſal commerce: for 'tis commonly with towns, as it is with men, the leſs take their meaſures from the greater: beſides that he was in his own nature fickle and malicious over and above; always repenting whenever he chanc'd to do any good, and endeavouring to cancel it again by a contrary act of miſchief. To inſtance in ſome particulars:

He ſet ſome priſoners at liberty once, and ſoon after clapt them up again; without the leaſt colour of any other reaſon for it, than to make their condition twenty times more miſerable and hopeleſs than it was before.

Others, that expected to die, were only baniſhed, and they took it for ſo much clear gain to come off ſo; not that they were conſcious of any even the leaſt crime to deſerve it, but they found themſelves in the hands of an unjuſt and an unmerciful judge. Theſe people, in fine, went into baniſhment with as good a will as others commonly return out of it, and behaved themſelves with as much honour and bravery in their exile, as if they had been at freedom in their own houſes. But it was not long yet, before Caius cut them off every man of them by a military execution, without ſo much as aſſigning any cauſe of offence; which put all the noble families in Rome into mourning, for the loſs of their friends and relations by ſo ſurpriſing an aſſaſſination.

And if he parted with money at any time, he would neither own it as a gift, nor as a loan, upon conſideration of intereſt, but ſtill find ſome way or other to recover it, as a fraud, or as a theft, to the utter undoing of him that received it; for it was not enough to force back what he had given, unleſs the whole eſtate hereditary and acquired went along with it.

But for thoſe more particularly that valued themſelves upon the honour and reputation of his favour, he found out ways to undo them with compliments and fair words, under the very pretext and countenance of that friendſhip. And this was done by putting them upon vaſt expence in treats and entertainments, and ſquandring away their fortunes in luxury and riot, to the degree ſometimes of devouring a conſiderable eſtate at a meal, and a deſperate debt at the end on it never to be repaid. This way of proceeding made all his plauſible appearances of generoſity look more like baits and ſnares than obligations, and people were ſo far from courting his good graces, that they were directly afraid of them.

This was his temper and conduct, variable and violent; toward the Jews eſpecially, who of all mortals were the moſt his averſion. He began his caprice at Alexandria, with the ſeiſure of their oratories, where he erected ſtatues and images to his own honour inſtead of the other, no body daring to diſpute the authority and the violence of the action. The temple of the holy city was now the only remaining ſanctuary the Jews had left them; and Caius had the confidence to attempt the appropriating even of that alſo to his own uſe and ſervice under the title of, The temple of the new Jupiter, the illuſtrious Caius.

Was

WAS there ever ſuch a piece of non ſenſical arrogance? Here is, in the firſt place, a man ſetting up for god: and a man, in the next place, that has the world at his feet already, and is not yet ſatisfied, unleſs he may be maſter of the heavens too. Is the Almighty to have no part then in a world of his own creation? not ſo much as a field, a city, or a temple? not the leaſt print or foot-ſtep of any place ſet apart for the ſervice of the true God. Well Caius! little do you think what miſeries you are now drawing upon yourſelf and your empire, in this execrable project of yours: a thing impious and impracticable, in the very nature of it, and not to be ſo much as thought of without horror.

CHAP. XVIII.

Caius's barbarous treatment of Philo, and the other embaſſadors of the Alexandrian Jews.

WE ſhall come now to ſome particulars that we both ſaw and heard, about the ſubject of the embaſſy, when we firſt entered upon this commiſſion. We were no ſooner entered the preſence, but Caius gave us to underſtand, in the fierceneſs of his looks, words, and actions, what we were to expect; and that he was not there as a judge, but as an accuſer rather than a party. For a fair and an impartial judge would have examin'd the matter in counſel, ſifted it from point to point, heard both ſides indifferently in their turns, and upon advice with the commiſſioners, have paſſed ſentence in open court: all this and more would have been done in form, eſpecially in a caſe of this conſequence, where the lives and liberties of ſo many thouſand Alexandrian Jews were all at ſtake; and the matter ſo clear, that for four hundred years it had never been ſo much as called in queſtion. But ſo far was this unmerciful tyrant from complying with the ordinary methods of law and juſtice, that on the contrary he treated us with a paſſionate brutality of inſolence and contempt, below the baſeſt of ſlaves.

MECENAS and Lamias had two gardens betwixt the palace and the town, which for three or four days had now been Caius's retreat. This was the place it ſeems that Caius had deſign'd for the tragedy of the Jews, and we ourſelves to be the ſpectators. Caius ſends for the gardeners, and bids them ſet all the doors open, for he had a mind to take the air, and entertain himſelf with the curioſities of the place; ordering them likewiſe at the ſame time to take us along with them. Upon this we were introduced, and caſting ourſelves upon our faces at the emperor's feet, we made our humble addreſs to him in the ſtile of emperor and Auguſtus. Caius returned the reſpect in ſuch a manner, as gave us to underſtand, that not only our cauſe, but our lives alſo were in danger. "Well, ſays Caius, with a grin, and have you the impudence to diſpute a divinity that all the world acknowledges, and to ſet up a nameleſs god againſt Caius, like an execrable race of wretches as you are!" With that word, he brake out into a blaſphemous exclamation, and ſtretching out his hands into the air, uttered ſuch words as ought not ſo much as to be heard, much leſs repeated, by any creature that believes there is a God. But theſe outragious indignities were looked upon by the other ſide as the prognoſticks of a certain victory, and there was not one attribute ſo peculiar to God himſelf, but they aſcribed indifferently to Caius.

THERE was one Iſidore ſtanding by then, a crafty inſinuating fellow, and an inveterate enemy to us. This Iſidore, finding Caius ſo well pleaſed with theſe execrable and unnatural flatteries, put in a word here to his purpoſe. "If you did but know, ſir, ſays he, the mortal hatred that theſe people, and the whole race of them, have for your imperial majeſty, you would abhor them ten times more than you do. When the whole world was offering up their vows and prayers for the ſafety of your perſon, and the proſperity of your government, theſe were the only men ſtood out. When I ſay theſe, I mean all the Jews without exception." Upon the hearing of this calumny, we all cried out unanimouſly to Caius. "Sir, we are ſlandered and belyed. "We have had our hecatombs and our ſacri- "fices in form, for the happineſs of Caius and "the empire, and after the ſprinkling of the "altar with the blood of the victims, we did "not carry the fleſh home with us and make "a feaſt of it among ourſelves, as many o- "ther people do, but committed the ſacrifice "whole to the ſacred fire. And this we have "done upon three remarkable occaſions. Firſt, "upon your majeſty's acceſſion to the impe- "rial throne: ſecondly, upon your recovery "out of that deſperate fit of ſickneſs when all "the nations of the world were in tears and "mourning for you: and thirdly, when we "offered up our vows and prayers for the ſuc- "ceſs of your armies in Germany."

"'Tis true, ſays Caius, like a hair-brain'd "madman, you did ſacrifice, but it was to "another, not to me; and what am I the bet- "ter for your ſacrificing to another?" This blaſphemous outrage ſtruck us with a trembling all over, and chill'd the very blood in our veins; but Caius went on however in the mean time, in a formal way of taking a view of all the apartments from the common offices to the treating rooms, and ſo from top to bottom, taking notice all the while where he found any thing amiſs, and how he would have it mended. And ſtill as Caius went ſauntring up and down, we follow'd him, only to make ſport for the company, by the raillery and contempts they put upon us, to furniſh matter for a farce: as the whole contrivance was in truth but a ſcene upon the ſtage, where the judge perſonated the accuſers, and the accuſers repreſented an unjuſt judge: and it was all but faction and malice, without any ſemblance of truth. But being now at the mercy of ſuch a judge, and ſuch an enemy, both in one, we had no defence left us but ſilence; eſpecially when we had nothing to ſay we could be the better for on the one ſide, beſide the endangering of the main cauſe on the other.

WHEN Caius had now given ſome neceſſary orders about the buildings, he put it to us in a grave formal way: "Pray ye, ſays he, how "come you to make ſuch a conſcience about "the eating of ſwine's fleſh?" This queſtion put our enemies into another fit of laughing, partly as they were pleas'd with the mockery, partly as they were tickled with the conceit; and in part, to curry favour with their maſter for liking the ſame things that he did. Now ſome of the very family, that had a better taſte of good manners than their fellows, were diſguſted to ſee men guilty of ſo much rudeneſs and ſawcineſs in the preſence of the prince: "For theſe liberties, they ſaid, were not ei-"ther ſafe or warrantable, but among familiar "friends and equals."

But now to the queſtion concerning ſwine's fleſh; our anſwer was, "That ſeveral people "and places have their ſeveral faſhions and "cuſtoms, and our adverſaries are prohibited "the uſe of ſome things, as well as we are "the uſe of others. Well, ſays one of the "company, but I have known ſome people "that would not eat mutton. Very good, "ſays Caius, merrily, and I cannot blame "them neither, for it is an unſavoury diſh." This bantering way of ridiculing us, was but adding affliction to affliction; but in the end, Caius call'd out to us in a peeviſh paſſion: "Hark ye, ſays he, I would fain know what "title you have among you to the city privi-"leges and freedom you make ſuch a talk "of?" We entered immediately upon the opening of the cauſe. But Caius, finding himſelf already pinch'd in what he had heard, and in danger to be more put to it in what was to follow, broke off the diſcourſe, and ſtarting up on a ſudden, ran haſtily into the great hall, and when he had walk'd a while there, from one place to another, he order'd the windows to be ſhut. The glaſs was as clear as cryſtal, and ſo fram'd, as indifferently to keep the wind and the ſun out, and to let the light in. After this he advanced up to us with a ſober pace, and very gravely ask'd us, "What we had to ſay." We were ſtill for ſhortning the caſe, when Caius takes another haſty vagary into a chamber, where he had a collection of antient paintings of the greateſt maſters, carefully depoſited. Theſe interruptions and diſappointments, one ſucceſſively after another, made us ſo ſick and weary of our vexatious and ſervile attendances, and ſo hopeleſs withal, that we look'd for nothing but death. In this anxiety of thought we betook ourſelves to the true God, with prayers and ſupplications to defend us from the rage and menaces of the god falſely ſo call'd, who in compaſſion to his ſervants, mitigated the perſecutor's fury: ſo that Caius, without any more outrage, paſs'd only this ſhort reflection upon us. "Theſe men, ſays he, that "will not believe me to be a god, are in my "opinion rather miſerable than wicked." And with thoſe words Caius retir'd, and ordered us alſo to withdraw.

After our deliverance from this judgment, or I might have ſaid, this priſon or theatre, we got a little breathing-while. It makes me think of a theatre, for we were ridicul'd, flouted, and hiſs'd at, like ſo many buffoons upon a ſtage; and treated otherwiſe like priſoners, but with torments of ſoul over and above not to be expreſs'd, in the horrid blaſphemies we were forced to be ear-witneſſes of, and under the outrages of a powerful and inhuman prince. And what was the ground of his implacable rage againſt us, but that the Jews were the only people in the world that refus'd to own him for a god? We do not ſpeak this as men afraid of death, for the love of life; but on the contrary, we ſhould have counted it as the greateſt of bleſſings, if it might but have advanced the common cauſe of our profeſſion. But in this caſe, our deſtruction would have been evidently the ſcandal, if not the ruin of our whole party; for the miſcarriages of deputies are commonly imputed to the ill conduct of their principals. This thought made us the more ſenſible of any thing that would look like a deliverance; beſide the anxious uncertainty we were in, to conſider, what ſentence the emperor might think fit to pronounce, upon the iſſue; for what could he ſay to the merits of the cauſe without hearing the particulars? Would it not have been a hard caſe for all the Jews upon the face of the earth to be treated after the precedent of their five embaſſadors? For if Caius ſhould gratify the Alexandrians, we ſhould never be quiet any where elſe. We ſhould have had neither friends, nor towns, nor oratories left: neither laws, rites, nor privileges; but all ſwallow'd up in ruin and confuſion, and no remedy but to ſink at laſt under the burden of an inſupportable oppreſſion. We were reduc'd, in fine, to the laſt extremity of a miſerable deſpair, abandon'd by our temporizing friends, and diſown'd effectually by thoſe we moſt depended upon, who knew well enough the paſſions he had for the vanity of being taken for a god.
